Religious Problems.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury: statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

News of the Week.

On the 17th Madam and "General" Diss Debar were sentenced to six months in the penitentiary.

Judge Lambert Tree, American minister at Brussels, will present Chicago with a statue of Rev. Father La Salle.

Home Rule votes are increasing.

Belgium elections are resulting for the Catholics.

Thousands of Russian peasants are dying of hunger.

A department of labor is being established by Congress.

Cuban liberty parties resent the intolerable tyranny of Spain.

Cardinal Gibbons is writing a book on transubstantiation.

Austria is enlarging its army to keep up with the other powers.

Milwaukee has six English papers and twenty-two German.

Arran tenants are warned that if they pay rent they will be dynamited.

About half a dozen negroes are lynched weekly in the South for criminal assault.

The Communists of Paris are activ, and Radical parties in general are growing in that city.

The Newcastle, Pa., Methodist church has been bought by the growing German Catholics.

Six Mormon elders with 150 Scandinavian converts arrived at New York on the 13th on their way to Utah.

The Union Labor party declares for postal banks, government telegraphs and railroads, an income tax, a secret ballot, and homestead laws.

The shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre at Montreal is becoming noted for its miracle-working powers, and receives large pilgrimages of the sick.

Dr. McGlynn says rackrenting is worse in America than in Ireland. He says, also, that the old parties hav forgotten the Declaration of Independence.

It has taken the wicked secular police and courts to settle the troubles between the spiritual-minded elders and pastor of the Petersburg, Va., Baptist church.

Millions of Rocky mountain grasshoppers hav appeared about Pasham, Minn., and the state authorities hav sent four car-loads of materials for their destruction.

Among the late church conventions, the quiet and peaceful gathering of the Quakers at their New York church contrasted with the clamor and tumult of the Methodist assembly.

A colored man has been admitted to practice law in the court of appeals in Kentucky, and Mayor Shakespeare of New Orleans has appointed fifteen blacks as police officers in that city.

Reactionary parties and nations throughout the world refuse coöperation in the Paris Exposition to be opened in 1889 on the centenary of the taking of the Bastile, while the advanced nations and radical parties are combining to make it a grand success.

A negro named Brown who lately came into Soddy, Tenn., and, announcing himself as Christ, opened a religious festival, has gained so many converts that the followers of the other Christ hav warned the new sect to leave in ten days or they will "catch hell."

Frederick III. of Germany died on the 15th and was succeeded by his son William II. The former insisted on unbiased elections and the removal of the governmental pressure that had always been exerted on them, and favored many liberal and American measures, but William leans toward militarism and absolutism.

MOSES GETS UP A SHINE.

And when Aaron and all the children of Israel saw Moses, behold, the skin of his face shone: and they were afraid to come nigh him.—Ex. xxxiv, 30.

Gems of Thought.

Speak not
Of soldiership. I loathe the word, and those Who pride themselvs upon it. —Byron.

"I hav heard the doctrins of peace and the brotherhood of man presented by my father ever since I can remember. It is perfectly impossible for me to see anything in military glory worthy of admiration. To me, any honest laboring man is more noble than the military hero, and I consider the sword a badge of disgrace. If I were a man, I should be so ashamed to be seen with such a thing at my side! Think what it suggests!" said Clara.—Marie Howland.

He asked me what were the usual causes or motivs that made one country go to war with another. I answered, they were innumerable; but I should only mention a few of the chief. Sometimes the ambition of princes, who never think they hav land or people enough to govern; sometimes the corruption of ministers, who engage their master in a war, in order to stifle or divert the clamor of the subjects against their evil administration. Difference in opinions has cost many millions of lives; for instance, whether flesh be bread, or bread be flesh; whether the juice of a certain berry be blood or wine; whether whistling be a vice or a virtue; whether it be better to kiss a post or throw it into the fire; what is the best color for a coat, whether black, white, red, or gray; and whether it should be long or short, narrow or wide, dirty or clean [transubstantiation] the use of music in churches, the adoration of the cross, and various church rites and vestures]; with many more. Neither are any wars so furious and bloody, or of so long continuance, as those occasioned by difference in opinion, especially if it be in things indifferent.—Swift.

We hav, in fact, to make our choice between science and suffering. It is only by wisely utilizing the gifts of science that we hav any hope of maintaining our population in plenty and comfort. Science, however, will do this for us if we will only let her.—Sir John Lubbock.

Science found agriculture plowing with a stick—reaping with a sickle—commerce at the mercy of the treacherous waves and the inconstant winds—a world without books—without schools—man denying the authority of reason, employing his ingenuity in the manufacture of instruments of torture, in building inquisitions and cathedrals. It found the land filled with malicious monks—with persecuting Protestants, and the burners of men. It found a world full of fear; ignorance upon its knees; credulity the greatest virtue; women treated like beasts of burden; cruelty the only means of reformation. . . . It found the world at the mercy of disease and famin. It found the earth filled with slaves and tyrants, the people in all countries downtrodden, half naked, half starved, without hope, and without reason in the world.—Ingersoll.

This singular man [Oates] had no other talent for imposture than an impudence which set conviction and shame alike at defiance. A man of sense or reflection, by trying to giv his plot an appearance of more probability, would most likely hav failed, as wise men often do in addressing the multitude, from not daring to calculate upon the prodigious extent of their credulity, especially where the figments presented to them involve the fearful and the terrible.—Sir Walter Scott.

Bible-making is easily enough executed if you, or Ezra, or anyone else, only keep up a due blending and admixture of ambiguity and incomprehensibility. Speak to the vulgar in language they understand, and they think you are simply one of themselvs. But it is very different when you, or Ezra, or anyone else, burst out into, "And they four had one likeness: and their appearance and their work was as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel. When they went they went upon their four sides; and they turned not when they went. As for their rings, they were so high that they were dreadful; and their rings were full of eyes round about them four. And when the living creatures went the wheels went by them: and when the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up" (Ezek. i, 16-19). —Saladin.

For fifteen centuries the pilot of the church lured our forefathers to a whirlpool of mental and physical degeneration, till the storms of the Protestant revolt enabled them to break the spell of the fatal eddies, and, like a swimmer saving his naked life, mankind has struggled back to the rescuing rocks of our mother earth. Lured by the twinkle of reflected stars, we hav plunged into the maelstrom of Antinaturalism, and after regaining the shore, by utmost efforts, it seems now time to estimate the expenses of the adventure.—Felix L. Oswald's Bible of Nature.

Nothing in the past is dead to the man who would learn how the present comes to be what it is.—Stubbs.

Odds and Ends.

"Papa," queried little Roscoe, "am I made out of clay?" "Why, yes—I suppose so—that is—the Bible says so, and——" "And is that why Uncle Frank says I'm a little brick?"

Adam (a good while ago): "It's all your fault." Eve: "Why is it?" Adam: "You had no business to go and entertain that serpent." Eve: "Well, you said you were tired of my chatter, and I had to hav somebody to talk to."

"Young man," he said solemnly, "what would you think if I should put an enemy into my mouth to steal away my brains?" "I would (hic) think, sir," hiccoughed the young man, "that you were going to an unnecessary expense."

Country minister: "I am very sorry, Mr. Wrangle, but as I was driving from the parsonage before service, I saw your little boy on Goosecreek bridge snaring for suckers." Mr. Wrangle: "Is that so, parson? Did ye notice what luck he was havin'?"

Miss Waldo: "Hav you any light rubbers, suitable for summer wear?" Dealer: "Yes, Miss; here are some sandals. This part protects the sole, and this little strap going over the shoe——" "Is the over-soul. What a nice idea! I'll take three pairs, please."

Stranger: "Can you tell me where I can find a slaughter-house?" Nativ: "Well, I got shaved at Hackman's around the corner, but there's——" Stranger: "I didn't want to get shaved." Nativ: "Oh, you're looking for the other kind. Sorry, but I can't direct you."

"Will you hav the kindness to giv me a dime, sir? I want to establish a trust." "With one dime? How can you do that?" "If I pay the barkeeper for one drink, you see, he will trust me for another." "Here is your dime, my friend. I like to encourage trade."

Country minister (to little boy fishing): "Sonny, do you know that in fishing on Sunday you are breaking one of God's Commandments?" Little boy: "Yes, sir. 'Remember the Sabbath day an' keep it holy.' Oh, I don't go to Sunday-school for nothin', mister."

"George, dear, shall we hang the hammock out under that beautiful chestnut-tree?" asked Maude, softly. "No, no, not that tree, not that one," he cried hoarsely. "Why not, George?' "Because, Maud, there are a number of things that I wish to say to you to-night."

Grocer (to Uncle Rastus): "Where did you buy that codfish, Uncle Rastus?" Uncle Rastus: "On de co'ner above, sah." Grocer: "You go there and pay cash for codfish, and you've owed me for a ham for six months." Uncle Rastus: "Yes, sah. I don't think 'twould be hones', Mistah Smif, fo' me to buy anything mo' of yo' till I's paid up wot I owes—'deed I don'."

Grandson: "So grandfather is dead?" Granddaughter: "Yes; and what do you think? Father says he's been insane these many years." Grandson: "That's a lie. Grandfather was as sane as I am." Granddaughter: "But he has left all his money to the church." Grandson: "Father is right. Yes, now I think of it, the old gent was peculiar. Why he has been an imbecil for years—mad as a March hare!"

Peter the Hermit (meeting Lord Bateman): "Bate, old boy, you always look happy, and yet you're a married man. How the deuce do you work it?" Lord B.: "Well, I'll tell you, old man. I've got the best wife in the world, and my mother-in-law is an angel." Pete: "Your mother-in-law an angel! Say, where is she? I want to get a look at her!" Lord B.: "Can't do it now, old man. You've got to wait till you go to heaven. She's there!"

I was from Boston and she from the West,
She sat with her beautiful head on my breast.
I loved her! To-morrow I knew we must part,
And in Browning's own words I poured out my heart:
"Let it be now, love! All my soul breaks forth—
How I do love you! Giv my love its way!
A man can hav but one life and one death,
One heaven, one hell. Let me fulfill my fate—
Grant me my heaven now! Let me know you mine,
Prove you mine, write my name upon your brow,
Hold you and hav you, and then die away,
If God please, with completion in my soul!"
I felt her arms round my neck entwine,
Her limpid eyes looked up into mine;
I waited her answer so soft and low:
"Say it again, and say it slow!"

He proposed as seriously as a humorous man could—and she laughed. He looked blue. Then she smiled, and said: "That is a capital joke." "What's a joke?" he asked in surprise. "Your latest. Shall you hav it printed?" "That was no joke. I meant it." "You did? Why, you hav written so much in ridicule of love, courtship, and marriage——" "Well, er—er—yes—but——" "I should never suit you. I write postscripts, stop before the mirror, am slow in dressing for church, admire a new hat, sometimes want a new dress, and——" "But, my dear Angelina, I should never object——" "You hav shown that happiness ends with marriage, and I hav a mother who would be a mother-in-law to you, and who would want to visit me; and——" "Why, I——" "And I may hav my animosities, and may look around in church; and you would find such a lot of things to write about." "My precious, I would only write about other people then; the neighbors, the——" "Those horrid Miss Sniffletons?" "For a fact." "And the stuck-up folks over the way?" "Most certainly." "Enough! I am yours!"

COL. INGERSOLL'S TRIBUTES.

REDUCED IN PRICE.

We hav made arrangements whereby we can offer these magnificent prose poems of Mr. Ingersoll's at greatly reduced prices. The Tributes are printed on heavy, toned paper, 18x22 inches, illuminated border, large clear type, suitable for framing. The titles are:

The Vision of War.

The Grant Banquet Toast.

The price of these heretofore has been 50cts. We offer them at FIFTEEN CENTS EACH; THE TWO FOR TWENTY-FIVE CTS. Mailed secure from breakage. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette Pl., New York.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 15. No. 26. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, June 30, 1888. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

THE RACE BETWEEN AMERICA'S INFIDEL ORATOR AND ENGLAND'S CHRISTIAN STATESMAN.

And after all, it may be that "to ride an unbroken horse with the reins thrown upon his neck"—as you charge me with doing—givs a greater variety of sensations, a keener delight' and a better prospect of winning the race than to sit solemnly astride of a dead one in "a deep reverential calm," with the bridle firmly in your hand.—Ingersoll's Reply to Gladstone.

Notes and Clippings.

It is said that Herbert Spencer, when asked what fact struck him most forcibly when in America with regard to that country, replied: "The indifference of the American people to their liberty."

There are clerical victories in Belgium and clerical defeats in Rome. Politics is full of religion in countries that hav an established church.—Independent. And it may be added that it is getting full of it here.

Paris is talking about erecting a monument to Jacques Daviel, the first oculist to practice excision of the cataract. He described his method in a paper which he read before the Academy of Surgery Nov. 16, 1752.

Late statistics of illegitimate births show them to be: In Scotland, 8.11 per cent; Austria, 1.48; Hungary, 8.3; Belgium, 8.48; Denmark, 10; France, 25.3; Germany, 9.22; England and Wales, 4 8; Ireland, 2 7; London alone, 3 9; Italy (including abandoned new-born infants), 7.58; Russia, 3; Spain, 5.4; Sweden, 10.2; Stockholm alone, 30.8; Norway, 8.3.

A novel mode of counterfeiting is practiced by a gang issuing false French bank notes, and composed of wealthy Russians and Austrians. They possess ships and crews and all the necessary apparatus. The notes are engraved at sea, and the plates are thrown overboard into the water. The ships put into ports, where accomplices receive the notes, scatter them, and giv back those unused. Then the whole establishment travels to another port.

Among late devices tending toward obliteration of national distinctions and fraternization of peoples is a universal postage stamp. This particular scheme, however, seems impracticable, as there would be no certainty that the country that sold and got the profit on a certain amount of stamps would do the work.

The demand for heraldic and genealogical works at the New York Astor Library is in its proportionate extent very significant, the greatest number of volumes consulted in any other department last year having been 16,214, as against so many as 4,664 in this. There is no country in which the interest in real or supposititious ancestors seems greater than in this republic, and the tendency to seek heraldic distinction steadily grows stronger, despite the most embarrassing obstacles to the discovery and proof of the right to bear arms, according to the laws of heraldry.

Michael Davitt says: "In 1881 there were 589,849 people relieved out of the poor rates in Ireland; in 1886 the number has swelled to 632,186. Side by side with these figures you can put those of at least 3,000,000 acres allowed to lie waste where there is so much poverty. If this land was thrown open to labor, as it would be under a home government, it would provide thirty-acre holdings for 100,000 persons, half a million human beings, and rescue them from the useless condition to which they hav been reduced by castle government and landlordism. I am not able to giv an appropriate idea of the number of insane persons in Ireland. They are, however, most numerous where the conditions of life are hardest. The poorhouses into which the evicted are driven are recruiting stations for lunatic asylums."

A collection of objects relating to religion—altars, priests' robes, and kindred objects—made in the course of several years by M. Guimet, was some time ago presented by him to the municipality of Paris on condition that a building should be specially devoted to them. The building, which is close to the Trocadéro Palace, has just been finished, and will shortly be occupied as a museum of religions.

There is to be no School of Philosophy this summer under the apple-trees at Concord, announces the Sun, with the exception of a single memorial session next Saturday devoted to eulogy of the late Amos Bronson Alcott. The surviving philosophers will begin to talk about Mr. Alcott at 10 o'clock in the morning and talk right on until 5 o'clock in the afternoon or later—perhaps the most delicate and appropriate tribute that could be paid to the memory of the departed philosopher and conversationalist.

There is arising in South America a nation which bids fair to compete with the United States in enterprise and population. During the last year the Argentine Republic added 5,000 miles of railroad to the 4,000 which had been built before. There will this year be 200,000 immigrants, chiefly from the south of Europe. There are over 3,000 public schools, and 230,000 scholars. The chief cities are lighted with the electric light, and abundantly supplied with telephones. During 1887 four thousand vessels entered the ports, and the revenue of the government left a surplus of six million dollars over the expenses. The religion is Catholic, and the language Spanish, although the Italian and the English are much used.

A new plan of irrigation has just been inaugurated on the Pawnee river south of Larned, Kan. A large wheel is placed in the edge of the water, which resembles somewhat a double windmill. The wheel is so constructed and connected that it is kept constantly turning by the current. To the rim of the wheel are attached eight large troughs, each holding eight gallons of water. As the wheel turns these troughs dip up water, carry it to the highest point of the wheel, and there empty it into the irrigation ditch. Through ditches and laterals it is then carried to the adjacent land. By this means the river by its own force is constantly turning a stream of water on the surrounding country.

Of the present very limited number of high stations for making meteorological observations, there are only two in Europe which exceed 3,000 meters in hight, being about 10,000 and 11,000 feet, respectivly. Among those in this country is Pike's Peak, which has an altitude of 14,100 feet, exceeding thus, by more than 3,000 feet, any in Europe. These great hights are much more accessible on this continent than in Europe, there being five in America where 11,000 feet or more is reached by railroads built for facilitating mining work; the highest of these in North America is Mount Lincoln, in Colorado, the mining works on which are 14,297 feet above the sea, and here is a meteorological station conducted by Harvard College. Another station is placed part-way up the mountain, at a hight of 13,500 feet. In the Andes range, in Peru, continuous meteorological observations are also carried on, the loftiest point for this purpose being 14,360 feet above the sea.

"And the sun shall be turned into darkness (and the moon into blood)" (Acts ii, 20). These words had no reference to the solar eclipse that occurred about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. Solar eclipses frequently occur, and always hav occurred, but none of them has ever turned the sun into darkness nor has the moon yet been turned into blood. The predicting of an eclipse would not be a prophecy, nor show forth superhuman wisdom. The text refers to a great and notable day of the Lord. The day on which Jerusalem was overthrown was no more a great and notable day of anyone than similar days in which other, and often greater, cities were given to the sword.

Christianity is not the rising sun of our time, but the declining one. It was fully risen in the days of the Emperor Constantine, at which time it threw its baneful glare upon every nation known to its propagators. Missionaries had disseminated its light in every land of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and its power was gradually but certainly augmenting, and the history of the ages will substantiate the assertion that the higher the sun of Christian ecclesiasticism rose, the greater became the gloom in the lands upon which it shone.

Under its influence there grew up temples, cathedrals, and palaces for its priests, bishops, and popes; huts and hovels for its adherents. It made kings and oppressors of the few, and subjects and slaves of the many. It gave wealth and luxury upon one hand, and squalid poverty and misery upon the other. In the nations that bordered upon the Mediterranean sea, it once held more people subject to its will than it does in the whole world to-day, and it sunk those nations in such ignorance and mental degradation as has not been equaled in the history of the world.

At last it reached the zenith of its glory and became the supreme power of all those lands where it had found acceptance. The noontide hour of the sun of Christianity was the Dark Ages of Europe. It was then that the curtain fell upon Christendom; henceforth there was to be no more freedom for human thought; the philosophy of nations was lost in the cosmogony of Moses, and intolerant fanaticism put to destruction whatever of science and education was found struggling under its blighting influence. For centuries the Christian church in Europe was without a rival; its sun was at its meridian hight; ecclesiastical despotism was triumphant; the ignorance of the people was complete and the moral degradation of the masses outrivaled any Asiatic nation of to-day. It was then as Christians would hav it! There was no dissenting voice; it was woe to him who dared to doubt; death to him who dared deny.

I propose to take Infidelity out of the realm of tragedy and into one of fact, and show you what it hopes to accomplish, what it has already done for mankind.

In the darkness of ecclesiastical night, when men were groping in the gloom and trembling with fear, when church supremacy wielded the rod of coercion over the heads of nations, then Infidelity shone amid the darkness like the rays of the morning sun struggling among clouds. In spite of fire, and sword, and rack, and wheel, and persecuting power, it prospered and grew. It robbed the priesthood of its power, although millions went down to death ere that power was taken away, It wrote upon the corner-stone of nations: Liberty, fraternity, equality. In its infancy it grappled with a giant and put him down; it shone amid the darkness of superstition and priestcraft, anarchy and fear, and the darkness was illuminated. It cried, "Let there be light," and there was light. It forced away the sword that had pierced the mother and the babe, and cast down the altars upon which human sacrifices were burnt. It broke the wheel upon which thousands had been broken, and ruined forever the rack upon which many had been ruined. Its light shone into the dark and noisome cell where priests were persecuting for opinion's sake starved and dying men and women, and it cheered the hearts of those whom it was unable to save. In place of priestcraft it gave progression, in place of ignorance it gave knowledge, instead of persecution it gave freedom of thought and speech, and instead of despotism and slavery it gave equality and proprietorship. It blessed the world with science and beautified it with art, and elevated the moral and physical condition of mankind. The condition of the people in China, Egypt, and Hindoostan is as good to-day as it was in Europe when Christianity was in full control. As Infidelity has prospered civilization has advanced, and, excepting a few countries that are still under the control of the church powers, Europe is superior to Eastern Asia; but it is the civilization, the arts, and the sciences that Asia is receiving that are improving it, and not their acceptance of the dogmas of the Christian faith.

Is it Atheism that causes the Chinese mother to put her babe into the dark waters to perish, or the Hindoo mother to cast hers to the crocodile? Was it Atheism that made ready Abraham's or that consummated Jephthah's sacrifice? Has Infidelity an altar upon which it ever offered a human being? Has it ever lighted the fagots about a human form, or executed a person as a witch, or put to death a person for difference of opinion, or ever cast into the flames a struggling babe, or killed a man for printing or reading the Bible, or hanged a woman for heresy or because she was a Quaker? Has it ever denied a man the ballot because of his creed, or made it a crime for a man to wear long hair? These things hav been done, not by Infidels, but by the ordained magnates of Christendom, acting under the authority of the so called inspired revelation. Is it not the extreme limit of faith, which men call fanaticism, that has shed the blood of offending doubters and innocent babes for ages past? They had too much faith; too little knowledge. As knowledge increases, faith diminishes.

Again, never since men hav been taught the terrible and revolting doctrin of eternal hell hav the vast mass of thinking men so universally repudiated tne falsehood as they do to-day, nor was there ever a time that crime was less common than now; furthermore, the nations which show the largest number of church communicants also produce the largest number of criminals. Civilization and education are the restraints against the brutal passions of the world to-day.

But suppose Christianity should regain its power! Suppose its sun should again darken the earth. What then? Forward, march! See the Christian hosts advancing. Cross in front of them; rack and wheel upon the right of them; stake and fagot and dungeon's gloom upon the left of them; groans and tears and death and bones in rear of them. Their three thousand missionaries become three million, bristling with sword and bayonet! Forward, march! Down with Confucius! Down with Zoroaster! Down with Buddha! Down with Mohammed! Down with Liberalism! Down with progress! Stand still!

That is what it tried to do, and under its efforts civilization was hurled back to superstitious barbarism and ruinous savagery. A more nefarious plot was never planned and executed than they planned and executed; they had full sway and Christendom was a lazaretto, a pandemonium, and a madhouse all in one room.

From such a scene, O man, whosoever thou art, turn away. You see where that road led. It led to degradation, to ruin, and to death, and its civilizing influence and affection denied its victims a decent grave.

Will Infidelity succeed? Has it not succeeded?

Will it ultimately triumph? It surely will! And as it succeeds more and more every day the light will be brighter, the air purer, and men grander and nobler and better.

Behold, the day is come; the strong, pure light is penetrating the dark corners of the earth, and men are rushing into its glorious rays as the mighty rivers rush into the sea. Raise up the banner; shout the cry to all the earth: More day; more light; more truth; more liberty forever! MESSENGER.

Adam.

How little is known of Adam, the progenitor of the human race, as alleged! And yet how much should be known of such a prominent figure—"the only original Jacobs," so to speak—even if not known for certain, as we know of Moses, Joshua, David, and other hustlers treated of in the Holy Queer.

To know so little of the Original Man argues that most of us, his descendants, will be known much less of in the coming ages of the far distant future—provided they come, which is no dead-sure thing, as far as this sublunary sphere is concerned, as it, in remote cycles of time, may be doing the comet act, for all we know or can guess to the contrary.

Adam, the first, the one, the lone, the previous, the original Man! Great Jones! but just think of him, will you? Why, there should be tomes on tomes' head of matter extant relating to Adam, the first man, for it may be millions of years before another first man makes his début here—millions of years! As it is, what and how much hav we got relating to him? A so-called "sacred history" in which he figures to the extent of about half of one of the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER; and there is a woman in the case at that, and later on, divers offspring; so you see he has to share that measly half-column of space with many others!

Spook of Adam! personification of previousness! but this is tough!—and the chump Jonah getting a full "book" in the Holy Queer! Spook of Adam, I say again, but this is tougher than tough, being too, too tough! Yes, reader, I say it, and say it boldly, that we to-day should hav a history of Adam which, for copiousness, would make that of J. Cæsar look like a mere paragraph—not the shortest, you know, but, say, like one of Evarts's unbroken sentences of a thousand words—and J. C. himself turn green with envy in his coffin daily!

Adam the first man! Did it ever strike you, reader, that Adam was the only first man—that is, the only first man reported? There may hav been other first men in other "beginnings," but we know nothing of them—and when we get right down to hard-pan we must acknowledge that we know nothing of our own first man; but nevertheless we read of him, and in the most meager history ever put forth of any first man on this or any other "footstool," and I'll wager on it!

When God wrote his "book" through "inspired" amanuenses, did he seek to damn with faint mention the first piece of humanity turned out by him, because, forsooth, he (man) did that which displeased him (God)? Perhaps so, but if so, then was he a stranger to the jewel consistency, for one of his pets and prime favorits, Solomon—others could be named, but one is sufficient to prove that he knew naught of the above-mentioned jewel—more sorely vexed the heart, and struck more anguish to the soul of Jahveh, than would the substance of ten thousand pippins, ripe and fine, scooped in by tempted Adam!

And what does he (Jahveh) do for Solomon? Does he damn him to any great extent with faint mention? Well, not that I am aware of. Does he giv him any extended notice in the Holy Queer? Well, I should smile. I should chuckle to convulsion. Giv him any extended notice? Why, he givs him a "book" devoted entirely to his wise sayings; half of another very long one devoted to his history and multifariousness in general, and a "song"—a sort of rhapsody, in eight cantos, that makes one tired, and is only sung by moonlight alone. That's what Jahveh does for Solomon, notwithstanding the latter "loved many strange women"—well, rather, I should say, his multifarious wife and brevet wife numbering a thousand, even up!—and, worse than all that, cottoned to the various brass gods which his very numerous wife and brevet wife paid her devoirs to!

Albeit Jahveh was touched on the raw by this bald-faced, bare-backed defection on the part of Solomon—he never kicked at the latter's multiflorous wife and brevet wife, per se, but only as she led her husband astray in the direction of other gods—which grew no better very fast, even after speaking to him twice about it, you see he did not go back on him when getting up his "book;" and why, if possessed of the above-mentioned jewel of consistency, he so damned Adam with faint mention, particularly as the latter ran after no "strange women" and gods, is what no fellow can find out.

The history of Adam, as it appears to the naked eye—what is it? A well-built edifice? "Not by no means;" a mere skeleton fabric, and without the full complement of bones at that! Here it is; look at it: "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground;" "and the Lord God took the man and put him in the garden of Eden to keep and to dress it"—here comes in some side business, the L. G. making a mate for Adam out of one of his ribs, as alleged; then the L. G. tells Adam he may eat pears, peaches, persimmons, and such things, including huckleberries, but must giv the succulent pippin a wide berth on pain of death; then appears that remarkable talking snake, its like never before or since seen, and gets in its work on Eve (so named by Adam "because she was the mother of all living" (?). Mother nothing! Who or what was she then mother of?), prevailing on her to bite into a pippin and see how good it was—a little digression here, Eve was an unsophisticated thing, and had never had any experience with a snake that talked before that fatal day, and what wonder she succumbed to its blandishments? Catch any of to-day's girls dallying with a snake, with only a pippin in prospectiv! Not much; nothing short of ice-cream would cause them to listen for a moment to a snake never so gushing! Well, then followed the grand bounce from the Eden ranch, with the sentence that Adam thereafter should "eat bread by the sweat of his face," the L. G. commuting the death sentence! But even this was terribly tough, if not toughly terrible, when we take into consideration how gently the L. G. dealt with the much more erring Solomon. After the bounce we hear no more of Adam, save incidentally, with regard to children born to him, until notified of his death, at the ripe old age of 930; "and he died"—during that long time barrels and barrels of sweat must hav rolled from his face, if he ate his bread as laid down for him by the L. G.

There, that's the sort of history that the Holy Queer givs of Adam, the first man—the whole and entire human race, for that's what he was! What do you think of the skeleton structure, after looking at the fine edifice erected to Solomon? A scraggy, disjointed, Virginia-fence sort of history it is, with a beginning and ending, with a head and tail, say, but no bowels! Who would be a first man on such terms as these?—now, see here, I don't mean the inevitable "first man" "in at the death," but the first specimen of the genus homo, you know. I say it was a shame the way Adam, our prediluvial progenitor, was treated in the Holy Queer, and chumps like Jonah getting in for extended notice!

It won't do to say there was nothing to build on, for with Adam human history commenced, and in 930 years he must hav made lots of it, even if not so brilliant and exciting as the sorts made by J. Cæsar, J. Sherman, Jay Gould, and other history-fabricators. I tell you no man can liv 930 years without making multifarious history, albeit no portion of it may be dreadfully startling; and Adam made history, for certain, but he got left!

I weep salt tears, not the crocodile sort, understand, but genuin human tears of regret, when I think how badly Adam got left by the L. G., when the latter made up his "book." Jonah, Jeremiah, and Joab, that man of blood and iron, when murder most foul did beckon, much better had been left than Adam, the first specimen of humanity turned out by the L. G., and by him pronounced good! It is too, too bad that Adam was so slighted by the omnipotent "book-maker," and were I a Bancroft, or historian of lesser caliber, I would write an exhaustiv history of our great progenitor, or perish in the attempt! Selah! SI SLOKUM.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

THE APOCALYPSE.

"'Saint" John, or Holy John, as we should call him if we spoke plain English, seems to hav been a very amiable and inoffensiv character in his younger days. Even his enemies could find no fault in him, and if he had not the bonhomie of Ingersoll, he had the seraphic spirit and angelic grace of Emerson. He was the one disciple whom Jesus loved, and a great deal of Platonic attachment existed between the two. Modern propriety would perhaps be shocked at one man literally lying on the breast of another, but with due allowance for the manners and customs of the period, it does not appear to hav excited any particular remark. The gospel attributed to John is to my thinking the best and least objectionable of the four. It says nothing about the Holy Ghost scandal, and throws no suspicion of unchaste conduct on Mary the mother of Jesus. If, as is generally supposed, John was the brother of Jesus, that fact supplies a sufficient reason for his reticence. The gospel consists for the most part of a philosophic monolog beginning with, "In the beginning." As it requires an *un*common sense to understand these parts, it would be scarcely fair to criticise them from a common-sense standpoint. Like the epistles of Paul, they are intelligible only to the initiated. I cannot forbear, however, noticing one gross mistake that has been held by theologians until the present day. They say the Bible is the word of God. If that be so, then the first chapter of John should read thus: "'In the beginning was the Bible, and the Bible was with God, and the Bible was God. All things were made by the Bible, and without the Bible was nothing made that was made," etc. Now, this is perfect nonsense, and, with all due respect to the Bible Society, whose benevolence of intention is unquestioned, they may as well convert the million Bibles they send abroad every year into papier maché collars and lending umbrellas for all the permanent good they will do or souls they will convert. The "'word" according to John had nothing to do with ink and paper, but was a living, creating power. "'The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." After many millions of failures, the word, or ineffable logos, succeeded in evolving a good and perfect man. But if evolution be followed, as modern philosophers contend, by the "survival of the fittest," it is evident that the man Jesus particularized by John was not the fittest in that generation, nor does he appear to hav been ever repeated in any succeeding generation. John was of a disposition similar to that of his elder brother, but less demonstrativ and aggressiv. He let the scribes and Pharisees alone and confined himself to the assertion of a God who was a very different character from the Jahveh of the Jews. "God is love. He that loveth is born of God." If we believe this, it overturns all modern theology, whether Calvinistic or Arminian. Shut up in this comfortable creed, John left the religious world of his day to their own devices, and they left him alone, for it appears that he lived to an extreme old age. It is said that he suffered martyrdom in the end, being boiled to death in a caldron of oil! This was "extreme unction" with a vengeance. But I do not believe the story. John may hav dreamed it, for after such a dream as is recorded in the Apocalypse or book of Revelation, he was capable of dreaming anything, however horrible. I do not say that none but a madman could hav dreamed it, but surely none but a madman would hav written and published it, and none but madmen or fools can believe it. Softening of the brain and lunacy is a not unfrequent close to a long and studious life.

He seems, however, to hav foreseen and in some measure foreshadowed the fearful state of things which was brought about by the establishment of Peter's church, and the ineffectual attempts made to chain the devil, of which the Act of Uniformity and the modern Prohibition movement may be already reckoned among the failures. The first millennium actually commenced with the establishment of a pope, who aimed at and actually acquired universal supremacy. The second millennium may probably date from the downfall of the papacy as a universal sovereign power. Neither of these changes has been altogether satisfactory, and perhaps the reign of the beast, by which John sarcastically implies the restoration of common sense, may not be without its drawbacks. None were to be allowed to buy or sell unless they bore the mark of the beast. It is well that all mercantil transactions should be regulated by common sense, but if it be reckoned a necessary ingredient in all salable commodities, works of theology, poetry, and speculativ science would be forthwith tabooed. We should be reduced to a nation of bare utilitarians, which is by no means desirable. Theology sharpens the intellect. Poetry elevates the fancy, refines and softens the manners. Speculativ science often leads to real science. Were these things abolished, the world would become excessivly dreary and matter-of-fact. Let us rather dream of a New Jerusalem, but let the foundations thereof be solid. Let it not be a city in the air, or confined to one small locality. Not until every man plants a portion thereof in his own homestead will the dream become an accomplished fact. I do not say that such a consummation is probable, but it is not impossible. "Heaven is my throne," said the God of the Jews, but he also adds, "Earth is my footstool." Modern theologians seem to forget this when they talk of "another world." We hav not yet, by a long way, made the best of this one. Nor shall we find when we come to die that we hav done with it. But, unless we leave representativs behind, the world will as individuals hav done with us. With the millions who hav preceded us what an immense quantity of bigotry, superstition, and cruelty has been consigned to the harmless earth! and who would wish the resurrection of a single individual were such a resurrection possible? And who will want us when we hav left this world? Surely not our heirs, if we hav anything to leave, nor those who ministered to our necessities, if we hav nothing.

Having commenced the gospel with Genesis, it concludes appropriately with Revelation. In both these holy books common sense figures conspicuously, but in the former it is called a serpent, and in the latter a beast! Whether or not it is the best and safest exponent of popular theology, I leave my readers to decide. OUTIS.

Our London Letter.

Some of the elect are congratulating themselvs that the church is returning to its former state of purity, though when that was they do not condescend to state, neither do they giv their definition of purity. Judging from the recent act of Canon Rawlinson, they must mean those happy times when the church was in a position to secure everything worth taking. This devout priest, although holding two good appointments, had the opportunity of helping himself to a third, and did not neglect his opportunity. Even the blind devotees of a rotten system could not stomach this, and a few of them took courage and entered their protest, and, to a certain extent, shamed this worthy canon, so that he now proposes to retain these several appointments for a year on trial to find out which is worth most money, and he will then, perhaps, decide to surrender one, though this is doubtful if he still survives, his object, no doubt, being that the matter will blow over by then, and he will be sure to bag the lot without any further opposition.

It appears strange that such a system, which permits an aged, infirm, and physically incapable individual to hold a plurality of benefices, should find supporters, and yet there are thousands who, while deploring these abuses, strenuously oppose any alteration for fear the structure should hopelessly collapse.

Another instance of the greed of the clergy may be cited. Application has been made to Parliament to permit a vicarage being built on a portion of public land, but as there was every sign of a strong opposition to this pretty little scheme the grant was refused, though it is quite possible it will be tried again at some more convenient season.

Although the churches and their allied societies are always on the look-out for plunder, they strongly object to return any of their ill-gotten gains in the shape of taxes, and one of the missionary societies, in the receipt of a large revenue, has given notice of appeal because they hav been assessed for income tax, though how they can reconcile such an act with the injunction of him they call "lord and master" with regard to legal proceedings, only they can explain.

The Welsh parsons are determined to hav their titles, and for this purpose hav organized a band of roughs, who make nothing of killing and wounding those who do not submit quietly to allowing their goods to be seized, and, as in the case of similar events in Ireland, these saintly men are thoroughly supported by the present government. The clergy are quite ready to defend their actions on the plea that they will starve if tithes are not paid, and never, for a moment, think of relying upon their heavenly father to supply their wants; neither will they follow the example of their favorit Paul, who boasted that he worked with his own hands to support himself, and was not chargeable to anyone. But then, "they did not know everything down in Judea," and if the apostles had had the same advantages as their modern representativs, there is little question they would hav played the same game. Some Features of a Modern Sabbath.

I am writing in the home of the Pilgrim and the Puritan, within four miles of Bunker Hill and within ten miles of Witch's Hill, surrounded with the graveyards where sleep our forefathers. I think what would hav been written one hundred years ago upon this spot about the "holy Sabbath." Then everybody was pious, or was supposed to be so, and went to meeting. Duty was made a necessity. That ecclesiastical constable, the tithing-man, looked after Sabbath-breakers, and thrust religion upon those who were not born to it.

Alas! the change! I wonder that the pious gravestones in "ye ancient" cemeteries do not sink out of sight through shame when the sounds of the modern Sabbath echo through the halls of the dead. Hardly a ghost of Puritanism can be raised in this year of somebody else's Lord 1888.

Let me mention some of the sights and sounds that meet the eye and ear on this "sacred" day, which we were commanded by Moses, or some other man, to "remember" and "keep holy." I look from my window out upon the sea, and the white sails of countless yachts show that pleasure is

Out on the ocean sailing.

I look in the direction of the two railroads, and observe the flying trains, on their wings of steam, bearing hundreds away from the churches in their quest for joy. The horse-cars pass within one hundred feet of the chair where I sit, loaded with people, going to the beaches, not for salvation—"if we know it."

The sprinkling-carts go up and down the streets to make the ride more enjoyable for those who go out for a drive. The ice-carts, too, are seen going about leaving their cool comforts by the way. Not only the sounds and sights which we hav mentioned assure us that the Sabbath is not remembered as it was wont to be, but on this "holy" day the profane voice of patriotism has intruded, and the noise of fire-cracker and torpedo is heard. Shades of all the Puritans! Think of it!

I ask, as I look from my window upon all this: Is it Sunday? Is this the day that the Christian church teaches is only properly remembered and hallowed by going to one of its places of worship? Is this the holy Sabbath commanded by that meek Jew, Moses? No! That Sabbath is dead; dead beyond recall; dead in town and city; dead on hill and shore; dead in doors and out, in heart and home; dead everywhere; dead utterly and forever. And let us bury it with those other dead who inspired it.

This corpse of time should be interred. This dead day should be removed from our calendar of civilization. The word Sabbath should be blotted from our language. Let the new day of the new life that has dawned upon the world be celebrated with joy. Every day belongs to man. No day belongs to Lord, church, or priest.

I find that the church, this guardian of the "holy Sabbath," relaxes its pious vigilance during the season when earth changes to leaf and flower. The ministers want a vacation. They get tired of playing their theological farce. In to-day's Sunday Herald it is announced in the column of "Catholic News" that "low masses instead of high ones will be had during the warm weather."

It makes no difference to the Catholic church whether it holds "high" or "low" masses, it always manages to get "Jack and the game" just the same.

Well may those who liv on the superstitions of mankind be alarmed. "The world moves." Man grows. Freedom is almost sacred. The prison doors of creeds are being opened. Light enters the mind. The end will be liberty, happiness, and life.

Hell in Poetry.

From the Boston Christian Register.

The London Christian World notes that "the charnel-house order of religious literature is not yet extinct." As an illustration it takes the following lines from a paper misnamed the Gospel Messenger:

Infinit years in torment must I spend,
Which never, never, never hav an end.
Yes, I must dwell in torturing despair
As many years as atoms in the air;
When these are spent, as many thousands more
As grains of sand upon the ocean's shore;
When these are gone, as many to ensue
As blades of grass and drops of morning dew;
When these expire, as many millions more
As moments in the millions past before;
When all these doleful years are spent in pain,
And multiplied by myriads again,
Till numbers drown the thought, could I suppose
That then my wretched years were at a close,
This would afford a hope; but, ah! I shiver
To think upon the dreadful word, "Forever."

This almost rivals Wigglesworth. But such lines to-day are little more than an epitaph on the belief they describe.

The American Secular Union.

Official Call for Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Local Secular Unions, Life, Charter, and Annual Members, and all Liberal citizens who support the Nine Demands of Secularism, Greeting:

You are hereby invited to attend the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, which will convene at Lafayette Hall, Wood street, near 4th, Pittsburgh, Pa., Friday, October 5, 1888, at 10 A.M., for a four days' session—5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th inclusiv.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State or Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Unions are entitled to seats and votes in this Annual Congress. Each Local Secular Union is entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates. Annual Members who pay or hav paid $1 in the national treasury are entitled to seats, but not to votes, except by unanimous consent of the Congress.

This Congress will specially consider practical questions tending to further agitation for taxation of church property; the abrogation of state aid to sectarian institutions; abolition of state, national, military, and prison chaplaincies; repeal of judicial oaths, Sunday and other oppressiv and unjust ecclesiastical laws; nullification of attempts to subvert our Constitution by a legal recognition of Theism in the American Magna Charta, and such other measures as will not merely thwart intended theological encroachments, but will absolutely expunge from our laws, state and federal, such insidious acts as hav already crept in to blot out mental freedom from our republic.

It is to be hoped that the addresses delivered will deal with the practical issues of the organization, so that there will be such an awakening of the people to these vital questions of the hour that a revival of the instinct of liberty and justice for all will necessarily result; that again from the Keystone state—the birthplace of our association—the clarion voice of freedom shall vibrate throughout the land.

Pittsburgh being situated almost in the center of a district containing many of our most distinguished workers, thinkers, and writers, besides the activ host within its limits, there is little doubt but that this Congress will be a glorious gathering of the forces who stand for mental liberty, as expressed in the desire for complete Secularization of the government.

From the Union Secretary.

Chicago produces a crop of howling political idiots every four years, and the number to the acre on this occasion surpasses all previous records. New-fangled tortures were invented specially to toot and rasp and shriek for the several favored sons—the more ill-favored and excruciating the noise the greater the demand for the toot. These diabolical devices are operated by great big burly men whose instincts, development, and brains are on a par with those of the small boy, whose angelic inclinations are sufficiently proverbial. Well, there's some excuse for their enthusiasm—it was pretty well paid for. "Enthuse" is a marketable commodity with which this city is highly favored, demonstrating that in this enterprising burg you can secure for spot cash anything but honesty.

Imagin the thermometer at 115° and nine thousand people packed and panting for breath suffering all this in the auditorium building for the express purpose of hearing Colonel Ingersoll make the Gresham nominating speech; then to add to their discomfort—to pile Ossa upon Pelion, as it were—the speech was made by our townsman with the suggestiv name of Swett.

After a tour of the grand Pacific, where the political magnates were as plentiful as toads after a shower, an observer could easily detect where the great high prince of orators, the man of matchless eloquence of our time and of all time, was located, by the stream of people anxious to grasp his hand, to see his charming wife, to behold his beautiful and accomplished daughters. Some committee came to invite him to speak at Central Music Hall that evening; he declined, but nevertheless he was advertised.

A dense throng are present; other speakers are introduced. The audience tire of everything and demand "Ingersoll!" "Ingersoll!" A brief letter is read from him showing that he will not be present, and, although good music is furnished, the house is stampeded. This just shows who has touched the popular heart beyond the Liberal field and outside the influence of treacherous politicians. But because the intellectual Titan will not bend to the beck of a Jay Gould, and has not seen fit to shout for the Old Man over the sea, certain little prigs of the press are anxious to make it appear that Colonel Ingersoll had lost his influence. In every movement during this momentous week, the nervousness of the Blaine managers was quite apparent as to what Ingersoll might do, which was an acknowledgment of the power they feared. Several times the convention desired to hear him, when the chairman managed to hav a committee report. Finally Friday night the demand was imperativ, and the colonel made an open, manly declaration in favor of the friend of the people, General Gresham. Oh! but that was awfully improper!

"CHURCH AND STATE."

Under the above caption, the Labor Enquirer of this city—a paper which fearlessly attacks the Jesuitry of Powderly—has a bold and philosophical editorial, which shows that one labor editor dares to speak the truth on theological questions. It says:

Slowly but surely priestcraft and capitalism are gaining absolute control of the state. In other lands and in former times the church maintained its ascendency in the name of religion; in our country and to-day it seeks to control the state in the name of morality. The priests in all ages represent that paternal tyranny whose central idea is that the people must be ruled. They know not what is the proper thing to believe, and the clergy must teach them—that is religion; they know not how to behave, and the clergy must teach them—that is morality. But these priests hav never been able by virtue of the beauty, or reasonableness, or usefulness of their teachings to persuade any people to their acceptance; hence they always form alliances with the state to enforce compliance with their notions. These preachers hav one-seventh of the time of the people, besides controling directly or indirectly all their educational institutions and literature, and yet merely as preachers they hav very little influence over the conduct or faith of the people.

Were it not for the fact that capitalism needs the repressiv and dextrous despotism of the church, the clergy might go begging, and the sacred altars of Jesu would be as desolate as the sacred altars of Jupiter. The clergy of every nation and clime hav sided with wealth, conservatism, and tyranny. They dominated every state in Europe till they were forcibly hurled from power, and, as a general thing, compelled to rank second instead of first in civil affairs. In our own country they were excluded by the Constitution, but in the century that has elapsed since that time they hav made themselvs felt in a thousand ways, till now they are not only audacious, but clamorous.

Last Sunday was a big day for priestcraft in Chicago. At present the saloon is the scapegoat that bears the sins of civilization. As in former days the easy explanation of everything that existed or happened was to say God made it, God did it, so now every evil thing we find in society is explained by pointing to the saloon. Chicago is in a bad way—very bad, and the preachers gathered in force on the day in question and shook out rotund ecclesiastical thunder. Capitalism and the capitalistic press nobly seconded the priestly aspirants for power, and the priests shaped their florid fulminations so as to make them seem an echo of a popular demand.

"No saloon within two hundred feet of a church or schoolhouse." For years it has been the practice of the clericals to speak of church and school-house in one breath—and in this they hav shown splendid diplomacy. The American people hav become accustomed to this dual presentation, and he would be a very poor stump-speaker that didn't seek to make a point by saying something about church and school-house. Chicago preachers made a ten-strike when they got the council to talk about the church and school-house standing on an equal footing. The school is a state institution jealously guarded by the people—the one institution that is honored, revered, and loved without distinction of party. Now, to get a church, the mere brick and mortar, the same recognition on some popular issue as is given the school-house, is a big triumph for the clergy, and another long step toward church-and-stateism.

Several steps hav already been taken. All sorts of chaplaincies, from the chaplain that prays for Congress at $10 a pray, to the chap that prays before a political convention in expectancy; the exemption of church property from taxation; the exemption of clergymen from various civic duties. These are steps already taken, but they are short ones compared with the majestic spring for which the Chicago clergy are now in training. If the church is so like a school-house, and so unlike a photograph gallery, that it must hav the same kind of legislation as a school-house and a different kind from a photograph gallery, it not only stands on a different legal footing from the gallery, but on the same footing as a schoolhouse. Indeed, it does that already—neither church nor school-house pays taxes—the gallery does. The photographer is not allowed to work on Sunday—that is the particular day on which the preacher earns his salary. The gallery must be closed on Sunday—the church runs wide open. Yet theoretically there is no church-and-stateism in this country, and the Constitution knows no distinction between a cathedral and a butcher shop, or between a preacher and a cab-driver.

Under the pressure of the united howl from the capitalistic press, kid-gloved respectability, and the preachers, the council may make the concession demanded—then look out!

The saloon answers the same purpose in the program of the preachers that the bloody shirt did the pious Union-saving politicians for twenty years after the war. This clerical movement is at present on the combination plan. It is a sort of preachers' trust, in which Catholic bishops, Episcopal bishops, Methodist bishops, and all manner of dissentient, discordant, and even antagonistic isms, "pool their issues," and strike for the coveted prize of state recognition, and later—well, they will see us later on.

The preachers, of whatever name, are the allies of capital and conservatism. They are subsidized by wealth just as the press is, and are steadily marching to power. When they reach the goal, American liberty will be a thing of the past.

How near that goal are we? Only the thin line of skirmishers of the American Secular Union hav up to the present moment resisted this destruction of American Liberty. No church in our state, is the new Declaration of Independence. With that we will yet stand firm on the threshold of freedom if—if you, reader, will but do your duty.

The Real Devil, and the Only Savior.

Is there a devil? Yes! It is vain to deny it. Alas! its accursed power is everywhere, all too plainly manifest. On every side we see hypocrisy, cruelty, crime; our hearts are daily saddened, sickened, at the sight of piteous deformity, horrible suffering, premature death—all hideous evidences of the actual existence of the mighty power of the dread enemy of mankind. The real devil—not the silly myth, with glaring eyes, horns, hoofs, and forked caudal appendage engraved as frontispiece of our grandmother's family Bible; not the childish fable of Christianity—but the dread present-existing reality, the author and founder of superstition and priestcraft. The inciter of the horrors of the Inquisition, the prompter of the clergy in their constant efforts to padlock the minds of men, and fill the hearts of gentle women and innocent children with a spirit of hate and persecution. The devil of devils; the father, the mother, the author of the existence of all the devilish devils ever by the devilish cunning of priestcraft conceived. The devil Ignorance! A devil personified in the credulous many, and kept in existence by the cunning of the clergy, who hav always sought to rule the masses by their fears, rather than guide them through their love.

A monstrous, all-powerful devil. One who never yet went about as "a roaring lion"—no, but like a slimy, cowardly, treacherous snake, a boa-constrictor, wriggling along till it succeeds in enveloping in its cruel folds the glorious truth, and in the fierceness of its malice crushes it into repulsiv mutilation in its sinuous writhings, casting its evil, mesmeric glamor over its poor victims till they become stupefied, and then with its remorseless fangs injecting its deadly poison.

Yes, we hav, indeed, a mighty devil to contend with.

But while we deplore the existence of this monster of evil, this devil, Ignorance, we rejoice in the sure knowledge of a savior, a redeemer—not the mythical, silly nursery myth, "Jack the Giant-killer"—not the Jew born without a father, who poured out his blood on Calvary's cross, after "he was dead already," but a real savior who is ready, able, willing to save us, to redeem us from the power of our great adversary.

We hav the accursed devil, Ignorance, but we also hav the grand and glorious savior—the Liberal printing-press, the mighty redeemer that is destroying the devil, Ignorance, and all his works, with bright facts driving out all dark delusions, dispelling pious frauds, and destroying priestly prestige and reverence for pious myths and fables.

No longer need we be affrighted or appalled by the power of the devil Ignorance, filling the whole earth and constantly seeking the degradation and brutalizing of mankind. Our savior is mighty to save. The Liberal press shall destroy the devil Ignorance. The glorious day is dawning; the long, dark gloom of night is pierced by the bright rays of the sun of reason, and the light of truth dispels the mist of ignorance. All hail! the Liberal printing-press, the friend of science, the protector of liberty, the true savior of mankind!

Reader! what are you doing toward proclaiming the glad tidings of salvation to your friends and neighbors down in the dark dungeons of superstition, manacled by the chains of priestcraft; starving, their only food the putrid old husks of faith; poisoned by the horrible miasma of fanaticism and bigotry, groping blindly in the cells of the demon Ignorance?

Oh! hav pity! Hav pity! Will you not help them? Never was there greater need or grander opportunity to prove the sincerity of your devotion to the ennobling principles of Liberalism! "Secure your own happiness by promoting that of others." Your friends and neighbors need the glad tidings of salvation, so ably presented each week in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

By securing new subscribers you greatly promote human happiness, and spread the glad tidings of the gospel of humanity, and help the true savior destroy the only devil.

The paper needs your help, needs it now. It suffers for want of the funds that would result from increase of circulation. Your friends and neighbors need the paper. Up! then, and to work at once. No time like the present. Now, now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation!

Save the editor and publishers from anxiety and worry. Save your friends and neighbors from the devil Ignorance. Save yourself from rotting with inertia and indifference. Make earnest, persistent effort. Take no ease till this duty is done and you hav sent cash to the office for at least one new subscriber. Do it! and your joy shall be prodigious. The editor shall smile and write with renewed vigor. The publishers shall wax fat with gladness; the subscriber, his family and friends, bless you, and you become exultant on having defeated the devil and aided the one, true, real savior. C. B. REYNOLDS.

N. B. If securing the first three or four subscribers should not produce the full effect, persevere, try doubling the number; it takes more in case of chronic inertia. But persistence invariably insures the promised effects. C. B. R.

Capt. Adams and His Father.

I am delighted with Robt. C. Adams's article on "The Principles of Freedom in Trade" in this week's TRUTH SEEKER; it is clearly seen and cogently stated truth throughout. Many years ago, when his distinguished father, Rev. Dr. Nehemiah Adams, of Boston, with his family, used to come to stay on Princeton Heights summers, I lay under apple-trees and talked "religion" with the boys (then orthodox myself), and am right glad that this one has not only become a brilliant heretic, theologically, but also faces toward Liberty in politico-economic morals. Free thought leads to free trade and all the other freedoms. It is rather late to try to defend slavery as a "protectiv" benefit to labor and business. Yet so subtle is the tariff swindle that many otherwise intelligent people really think it helps working people and business men; whereas it invades and plunders all except a few "protected" monopolists.

How so bright, honest, and truly able a man as T. B. Wakeman can favor the tariff fraud I cannot see, —unless it is caused by his irrational deference to materialized appearance rather than to essential facts; his supposition that majority despotism, coerciv government resting on compulsiv taxation, is either right or necessary. Aug. 1, 1878, he came over to Faneuil Hall, Boston, when I was in Dedham jail, and made a magnificent plea for free speech—probably the ablest legal defense of it yet made. But when he touches labor, trade, money, temperance, Mr. Wakeman favors interference, invasion, robbery. "Protection," greenbackism, state Socialism, are simply Comstockism made to cover all matters except "obscenity."

I always read, with interest, everything Capt. Adams writes, and hope we shall hear from him again on free trade in your catholic columns. His father was one of the ablest and most devout of New England divines. I am glad indeed that THE TRUTH SEEKER welcomes expression of opinion in so many reform issues. If he still, personally, livs, Stephen Pearl Andrews, the Pantarch, is unquestionably pleased with your drift and purpose. Anyway, you are carrying forward his noble work.

Princeton, Mass., June 26th. E. H. HEYWOOD.

Professor Leahy About Mr. Walser.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I beg a small space in your valuable columns to set your readers right on the statements made by G. H. Walser in your issue of June 16th.

The sarcastic manner in which Mr. Walser speaks of me as "this noble-minded youth," "exemplar of mental ability and moral worth," "young Leahy," etc., is sufficient to demonstrate to your readers the want of a tenable position in this matter on his part. For two years Mr. Walser exhausted the English language on every possible opportunity to speak my praise for "mental ability and moral worth," and now he resorts to the above.

The intimation that I had anything to do with the writing of the "anonymous" article to which he refers is maliciously false. It was as much a surprise to me as it could hav been to him. I had previously told Mr. Walser that my hands were clean, my record clear, and that what I had to say I would say to his face or put my name to it. For two years he has lauded the Freethought University as a great enterprise, a glorious institution, and now he speaks of it as an insignificant affair. He says I hav induced three non-resident students to attend. In this he has given three-sixteenths of the truth. I wish he had done as well in his other statements. The university roll of students will show sixteen non-resident students from the states of Indiana, Illinois, Minnesota, Missouri, Kansas, California, and Indian Territory.

He states that "fourteen of the seventeen of the board of managers" doubted my fitness to preside over the destinies of the students. Now, Mr. Editor, there was but one member, besides Mr. Walser, of the board of managers that has controled the institution for the last two years, who was opposed to me. That board was composed of men who were stockholders and had sons and daughters in the school. The one member who "doubted" me was D. P. Greeley, for years popularly known in Liberal as "Walser's caudal appendage," and, until Walser "doubted my fitness," the "caudal appendage" was my warmest supporter—in whichever way Walser turns the tail wags.

How about this "fourteen of the seventeen?" First, they were this new board, composed intentionally of non-stockholders and enemies to the institution; second, there were not fourteen of the seventeen. Five of that board were warm supporters of me. Further, the enemies on that board were about all the enemies that I hav in the state of Missouri. Nine-tenths of the people of Liberal are my firm friends and supporters, and if Mr. Walser can read the condition of affairs, he knows that his attitude in this matter has seriously lowered him in the estimation of the people of Liberal.

As for his eulogy of Mr. Bigelow, I care nothing, but will drop a word that readers may know what Mr. Walser means by being found "in the front ranks of Liberalism—that Liberalism that is calculated to elevate humanity." Mr. Bigelow is especially noted for his opposition to progress and civilization, "because the savage is happier than the civilized man;" for his opposition to higher education, because "college-bred men are dudes," and "great men like Lincoln do not need a college education." He is also conspicuous for the tobacco dribbles that at all times cover his long white beard, and for spending a good share of his time at the card-tables in Liberal, a place where I was never seen. But this was preferable to my "scholarly polish and pronounced teachings on temperance." I opposed Prohibition. Mr. Bigelow may hav taught a country school forty or fifty years ago, but he does not use the English language as well as the ordinary twelve-year-old boy in our public schools of to-day.

These statements are not made from any desire to attack Mr. Bigelow, but in self-defense against Mr. Walser's smooth tongue. Mr. Bigelow is a good-hearted old man, but he is a hundred years behind the times, and to elect him chairman of a board of managers of a university is a most damnable farce, and though Mr. Walser may try to smooth it over as much as he pleases, the people of Liberal, and the Liberals of the country, know him too well.

And now, dear Mr. Editor, I wish to thank you for granting me this space in your columns, especially since you hav already given considerable space to this subject.

I shall not again take the time to reply to an article in which I am alluded to by such epithets as Mr. Walser used in his article. M. D. LEAHY.

"Hav Women No Souls?"

Editor Express: In your Sunday's issue, of June 3d, I read a letter from a woman in Illinois condemning the action of the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in regard to excluding women delegates. Her views meet my idea of it exactly. In reading the proceedings of the conference I felt so indignant that I was strongly tempted to withdraw from the church, when, lo and behold, according to the ruling of the conference, I am not a member.

I hav spent over fifty-eight years working with and for this church. I hav not only made pin-cushions, but sweltered over a hot cook-stove, baking cake, cooking oysters, and making coffee for festivals, gotten up by the women at the suggestions of the preachers, to raise money to buy organs to furnish the church—to pay the deficiencies in the minister's salary; and now these ministers make long and loud speeches to prove that women are not members of the church.

What are we? Hav women no souls? I thought I was in the church. I hav spent my whole life and means and influence in serving the Methodist Episcopal church, and now, nearly at the end of life, I find myself ruled out by the action of this great body of holy men. A WOMAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The foregoing communication appears in the San Antonio daily Express of this morning. Your correspondent would like to answer the interrogatory as given in the headline of this note at length, but, after reflection, finds that it would involve psychological and even metaphysical questions, hence the response will naturally be brief.

Theological philosophy tells or teaches us that "man is possessed or animated" by a "living soul;" that the human body furnishes the visible tools for five variously constituted qualifications called the five senses. Query: Where is this soul, if the tools, i. e., the physical components of the human body, are stiff and cold in death?

We will consult the modern or revised Bible, a copy of which is before me—and it is a daisy. According to it "man" was made (Gen. i, 27) "male and female." Then (Gen. ii, 2) "God ended his work." He must hav been tinkering and patching on the original even on the Sabbath morning. According to Gen. ii, 7, "man" is again made of dust and receives by the breath of the Lord into his nostrils a living soul.

Now, notwithstanding the omniscience of the Lord, he discovered that it was not good for man to be alone, and here the "rib" transaction comes in (see Gen. ii, 18–22). This woman from the newly made sample of humanity was treated stepfatherly, for it is not recorded that a living soul was blown into her by the breath of the Lord, and here comes the answer to "A Woman" that a woman has no soul!

It might be a good suggestion to publish a cheap edition of Miss Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods" for distribution broadcast over the land into the hands of every woman to read. This would do more toward the emancipation of the sex from ancient and modern degradation of women generally from the adhering to a false code of morals for which inspiration is claimed—a wrong conception of the same as inculcated by a lazy set of men (?), ignorant, arrogant, and impetuous—nay, even tyrannical—in the enforcement of their (mal) administration of their narrow-minded definition of religion.

In connection with the foregoing, I furnish you with a short paragraph, translated from a German historical novel, which may teach a lesson to many narrow-minded men who belong to the same class of ignorant would-be divines in their self-constituted arrogance and pharisaic haughtiness. It is from the second chapter of "Fuerst und Musiker," by Max Ring:

The heart of a woman is for the majority of men a book of seven seals, an indefinable, closely veiled, and indescribable kind of book, full of never yet explained characters and mystic hieroglyphics. Even the closest observers get disappointed, and discover only too often that they made a painful mistake. We explore earth and heaven, calculate the course of the stars, measure the depths of the seas, discover the secrets of nature, but we neglect the most important for our happiness, most necessary science, the study of woman—the knowledge of her feelings and passions, her apparent moods and often changing humors, behind which the greatest dangers for her and us are hidden. We complain of her weakness and faithlessness, instead of accusing our own ignorance and blindness.

San Antonio, Tex., June 8, 1888. ARMINIUS.

"Scholars of Infidel Color."

Before the list of "Scholars of Infidel Color" goes out to the public at large, I think it is meet that the long and honored list of names of men, as quoted in last TRUTH SEEKER, should be prefaced by the names of women—the mothers of men, the formers of men, and sure to be, in time, the leaders of men.

One among these woman workers whose influence has been world-wide, and always for the highest and best, is Frances Wright; and another who equals, if not excels, her is Harriet Martineau. Then there are George Eliot, George Sand, Madam Roland, Lucretia Mott, and so many hundred living working scholars of the same Liberal school of thinkers that the pen fairly reels at the task of attempting to enumerate them.

First and foremost among the latter is Ernestine L. Rose, a beautiful woman with a beautiful record of beautiful works.

The reason why these noble women hav not written long lists of scientific and scholarly works is because, like the ox and the ass, they hav been enumerated by men among their possessions—goods and chattels—and men hav claimed their time, brains, and very selfhood.

The few women who hav a record hav won it despite man's power and supremacy. Men hav been the religious and political leaders, the historians and publishers, and, above all, the property-holders, and whatever woman has produced has been usurped to add to man's power and glory.

Mothers hav made idols of their sons and crowned them with the richest fruits of heart and brain.

All George Washington was he owed to his mother, and yet posterity hardly knows the name of that wise, good, and self-abnegating mother.

The old adage claims that home is the sphere of woman—and often a little hades instead of a real home is that sphere to her.

But the time is near at hand when she will own herself, and be no more tied at home than is her brother, man.

Whatever is right and proper for a man to see, do, or say, will hereafter be right and proper for a woman to see, do, or say.

Equal chances for education and improvement will be the right of each sex.

Woman has helped educate man into power and domination, and now she must do her share toward educating him out of it.

She must expel this historic supremacy and teach liberty, equality, and fraternity, if not maternity—for, as Socrates says,

Woman once made equal to man becomes his superior.

Science and the Southern Presbyterians.

From Life.

The Southern Presbyterian general assembly has relegated Darwin to the humiliating insignificance of an exposed pretender, and stamped "The Origin of Species" as a mere scientific charlatanry. The presbytery, led by the Rev. Dr. Smoot, last week recorded itself thus, in Baltimore: "Now, therefore, it is the judgment of this general assembly that Adam's body was directly fashioned by almighty God of the dust of the ground, without any natural animal parentage of any kind. The wisdom of God prompted him to reveal the fact, while the inscrutable mode of his action therein he has not revealed." It is very pleasant for men who do not hav time to study scientific questions to hav a body like the general assembly look into the matter and decide things for them, and—but, come to look things over, we do not find that there were any men of recognized scientific attainments among the delegates in Baltimore, and we are reasonably sure that Dr. Smoot is not known to students of science. Can it be possible that the assembly adopted this resolution without investigating the Darwinian theory?

We trust not. We hav no doubt, however, that a great many of the delegates to the assembly were inclined to ridicule the Rev. Mr. Jasper, of Atlanta, when that eminent theologian put to rout the pretenses of all scientific astronomers from the time of Galileo to the present, by his discovery that it was the sun that moved while the earth stood still.

The Spirits Once More, and Finally.

I did not intend to write any more about spirit manifestations, but shall I allow my wife to hav the last word? She has described a dark-circle séance which I did not attend, and has added something about another light-circle which I did attend. So let me tell a little more about it.

My brother and his wife went with us. I was again selected as a sitter. Between me and the medium was a lady. The usual performances were repeated. The guitar came upon my lap and was played upon, while I held the lady's right hand, and she said that Mr. Keeler never let go her left arm with his two hands. The instrument was carried back of the curtain by invisible hands under our chairs, and there it was held up in sight by the same occult power. It struck me hard blows on my head. Some feared it would hurt me, but I said, "No, my head can stand it if the guitar can." The tambourine also gave me a whack. I wonder how George Christy came to know that I hav a hard head!

Pretty soon Mr. Keeler's vest came off, and, as before, all buttoned up. But this time it had his watch and chain attached, and, instead of being thrown out on the floor, it came sliding down the curtained lap of the lady sitter. A few moments later Mr. Keeler's coat came flying from the inclosure behind us.

A change of sitters was now made, and when Mr. Keeler was uncovered he was without coat or vest.

My brother was now chosen by the spirit guide as the next male sitter. Between him and the medium was a lady. My brother was punched and whacked as I was. A hand came over his left shoulder, and he took hold of it through the cloth. He said it felt warm and was as real as a material hand could be.

And now messages began to be written behind the curtain. At first they were merry salutations. One was, "Hello, Burr." A few hands were exhibited. I distinctly saw a small one come out from the curtain close to the face of the lady sitter. She told us she had recently lost a daughter, eleven years old.

My wife got two significant messages, as described in last week's TRUTH SEEKER. Her sister, who came for the first time, and was unknown to all present except ourselvs, got a message written by a spirit hand before her eyes. It was signed with the initials of her father. I got one from my brother David, saying, "Will giv you more wonderful manifestations soon." Mine came from behind the curtain, but I saw the hand that wrote for my wife's sister on a tablet held by her on a tray in front of the curtain.

The spirit guide was asked to rap the number of persons present. There were twenty loud and distinct raps—the exact number.

And now I must say something more about the dark circles. We went to another. Capt. Wash. Emmons (not Eames, as first printed) was there, as usual. He is the only spirit that can speak quite loud, and he is not able to talk when he gets a few feet from the curtain. He says he lived on the dividing line of the township, between Kennebunk and Biddeford, Me., and that he used to vote in both towns. His first vote, he says, was cast for Hayes and Wheeler—that is, he put in two votes. And if Blaine would be the nominee this year, Wash. would like to put in two votes for him.

The lady who led the singing apologized for not being in good voice, and not being well supported. "Yes," said Wash, "it wasn't very unanimous."

My wife's father and mother appeared again. He was able to whisper his name. My wife's sister (not the one who went to the previous light circle) went up and recognized her father. The mother could not perfectly materialize. She whispered to my wife and said, "I did not expect her to come here"—meaning her other daughter.

A colored woman clothed in white came out and danced in plantation style. At one time there were two spirit forms visible, a young son and young daughter of a lady present, who went up and conversed with both.

This was expected to be the last of Mr. Keeler's dark circles prior to his leaving Washington for the summer. But a gentleman wanted another with Mr. Keeler and his wife as mediums, hoping for better manifestations with the two. There were thirty-eight persons in attendance. The folding-doors were opened to make more room, and the curtain was drawn across the front corner of the parlor.

I cannot say that the results were any more satisfactory than when Mr. Keeler was the only medium behind the curtain. My sister came covered with white drapery and a veil, and she could only whisper a few words. My wife's sister "Caddy" came, but did not giv any further test of identity. The colored woman appeared and danced to lively music. I was the nearest man, and she held out her hand to me to join in the dance. The hand was large. I could not refuse to dance with her, but was glad it was so dark that the company could not see what a poor performer I was. My wife noticed that she had white stockings. Mr. Keeler wore black ones, and I am sure the hands and figure of that "spirit" were not those of the delicate and beautiful Mrs. Keeler. The features I could not distinguish.

Captain Wash. Emmons had much to say. Since the withdrawal of Blaine is going to cause the defeat of the Republican party, Wash. would like to cast two votes for the Prohibition candidate, Fisk.

Most of the materializations were recognized, and at one time there were three figures visible. I noticed that the spirit of a young man who had appeared at a former séance and was recognized by his father and other friends, was not so tall as before by some two or three inches. This I afterward mentioned to the father, and he said that when his son first appeared he was quite short, but now he generally stood six feet two inches, as in life. But the features were always the same. And one thing is attested not only by the father, but by my wife and others on this occasion, to wit: when the figure disappeared it sank down as if through the floor, so that at last only the head appeared at the father's feet. This is a frequent thing, though generally the figure seems to retreat behind the curtain. Sometimes it vanishes with a loud noise.

It seems an utter impossibility for all these phenomena to be produced by Mr. Keeler and his wife. They went into the inclosure in ordinary dress before us all. She had a bunch of natural flowers pinned to her bosom, and at the end of the séance those flowers were undisturbed. The curtains were open to inspection before and after the séance. When Mr. Keeler's coat was off, as so frequently happens at the light-circle séances, we noticed that he had an elastic attachment to his shirt-sleeves to keep the wristbands back. But Captain Wash. Emmons, who always appears without a coat, had no such attachment to his shirt-sleeves. In short, we hav raised every conceivable doubt about the spirits at the dark circles, and yet none of us can believe that we are deceived by the mediums. Furthermore, we are all so certain that there can be no possible deception in the slate-writing, or in the partial materializations at the light circles, that we are almost precluded from accounting for these full materializations on the hypothesis of fraud.

I hav conversed with many about the manifestations, and hav yet to find one who thinks there is any fraud or deception in the slate-writing or the phenomena exhibited at the light circles. How these can be accounted for except on the hypothesis of another life, I am unable to conceive.

But then the question is propounded, If our life is never to end, had it ever a beginning? I once put this question to Stephen Pearl Andrews, and his answer was something like this:

A prince became discontented with his condition, and went secretly to sea as a sailor. After two years he returned and again entered court life. May not spirit life be a change something like that? May we not, in the spirit world, be able to look back through the eternal vista of our past existence, until we are tired of the contemplation and want once more to enter earth life where there is no remembrance of the past! In that way may we not hav lived an infinit number of planetary lives, which we remember only when in the spirit sphere?

But there are other and perhaps more difficult questions involved in the hypothesis of another life, which I forbear to propound. That there are many frauds in the exhibitions of spirit phenomena I freely admit. I myself hav detected and exposed them. And yet, though indignant at the deception, I am constrained sometimes to giv the medium the benefit of a doubt, by imputing the fraud to a mischievous spirit. Never, since my first acquaintance with the phenomena, now nearly forty years ago, hav I doubted that some of the manifestations are genuin; and but for such evidence as this, I think I should be disposed to believe that death is an eternal sleep.

Washington, D. C., June 10, 1888. W. H. BURR.

Free Trade Did Not Cause the Revolution.

It was caused by an exorbitant tax, like the present tariff.

I desire to answer Mr. J. R. Perry's article of June 16th. Mr. Perry refers to a call for a convention at Annapolis, Md., June 29, 1769. Why was this convention called? Was it because of free trade? His article states that it was from the fact that the colonists were compelled to pay a tax of from 120 to 150 per cent on goods imported from the mother country. And Mr. Perry would hav us believe it was free trade that caused the Revolution with a 150 per cent tax on imported goods! It cannot be possible that Mr. Perry is a fool, but he must consider all others fools to swallow such demagogism! I propose to giv Mr. Perry my own situation—"just as I am, without one plea." I am a photographer; hav worked at that business for fifteen years. Last fall I purchased a bill of 5,000 cabinet mounts of a Philadelphia manufacturer at $12 per thousand. This spring through an importer I purchased 5,000 of the same grade of cards from a German manufacturer. The bills were the same; were the goods alike? Yes, to all outside appearances, but when torn apart the home-manufactured card was of a coarse, unfinished pulp, while the imported one was of fine fiber and compactly pressed. Now, Mr. Perry, I paid $27 import duty on the German cards and $33 for the 5,000 cards, making $60. I did not pay any import duty on the Philadelphia cards stock, but I paid $60 for them all the same. I hav a lens that cost $125, the duty on which was $56.25. I hav another lens that cost $60, the duty being $27. I hav still another lens that cost $25, the duty being $11.25. During the last fiscal year I hav purchased four reams of photograph paper, the duty on which was $57.60; thirty-one boxes glass (at $4 per box), $124; duty 78 per cent.

Oh, how I do love the tariff! I state further that I hav footed up the cost to myself of the tariff per year at $960. No government on the face of the earth would dare levy a direct tax on a business of about $4,000 per annum in that amount. My entire property would not bring under the hammer $2,000; yet, I am compelled to pay yearly almost the half of what I am worth to support the most damnable vampire system of robbery the world has ever known. Nine years since (1879), I purchased the property on which I now liv (stay) and gave a mortgage of $800 on it! To-day I still owe $700, not having been able to pay a dollar—a dollar—except the interest, for eight years. Oh! but I do love the tariff—that bleeds me of $960 every year!

Now, Mr. Perry, I want to say one more word to you. I and my workmen earn this $960. Has any reprobate on the face of the earth a right to deprive me of it? Has any reprobate, government, autocrat, or power of whatsoever nature the moral right to force me to contribute to their personal aggrandizement to my personal discomfiture and loss?

Oh, I do so love the tariff—that iniquity, born of a necessity, I admit, but perpetuated through the most damnable demagogry and unholy alliances imaginable! SANFORD.

PROTECTION MAY CAUSE ONE.

I would like the privilege of making a few comments on the tariff article in last week's issue, written by J. R. Perry. I receive the impression that he is half conscious that he is on the wrong side of that question; and surely if a Liberal he will soon outgrow his own arguments, for a man who can reason well enough to become a Liberal cannot long be a protectionist, as the idea is championed by the Republican party of to-day. The most of your readers are keen, unprejudiced reasoners, accustomed to discern false arguments, to penetrate at a glance all forms of pretense and efforts to deceive, and are in no need of long-drawn arguments to convince them that protection is a fraud, humbug, and an instrument of oppression in the hands of the few, against the many, second in its ruinous tendencies only to the gigantic evil of church rule and power.

But for the benefit of your correspondent and his sympathizers, I will call attention first to his assertion that it was against the principle of free trade that the colonies rebelled. I would ask him to reread his own explanation of that idea, and see if he cannot understand just the opposit, the fact of the case, which is that it was against protection, against not only the theory, but the attempt to put it in practice, that they rebelled. At that time England was in the hight of her fatuity. As an example and exponent of protection she was so bound up with the protection idea that she was not satisfied in applying it to all other countries, but attempted to apply it within the limits of the same common country—attempted to tax one section of the country for the benefit of another—it was protection carried to its last point, and in its effects showed the principle to be wrong. The colonies refused to be subject to such kind of protection, and rebelled. The result of that rebellion is the United States government. A long and hard war was waged against the very principle that is in practice in our country now—protection by taxation of the many for the benefit of the few, a principle so pernicious in its operation that unless soon abrogated it must lead to another rebellion. If your correspondent will carefully read the early history of this country, he will find the universal sentiment was against protection, and that such high rates of duties as we now hav never were thought of, not even when the present tariff was established as a measure of protection. And this leads me to the point where Mr. Perry laments the fact that free traders insist on calling the tariff a tax on the country, and poorer classes especially. Such is the fact; why should we not so declare it?

There is not a record to show that the tariff established during the late war was for the purpose of protection. Not an argument was made for the bill, when under discussion in Congress, on the ground that it was a measure of protection. The tariff was levied for the sole purpose of raising money by taxation—a tariff for revenue—to meet the expenses of the government—good free trade doctrin! Everybody expected it to be repealed when the war was over, but it was not; and soon the same law—the same tariff—levied as a tax measure, began to be called a tariff for protection, and was dignified by receiving the misnomer, "American system;" and, by the adroit management of those men who were reaping millions through the operation of that law, many people began to look upon the tariff system as a great boon to the people.

That same class of men are trying to deceive the people to-day, and by crying, "Pauper labor," "American wages for American laborers," etc., they pull the wool over the eyes of the unthinking masses, and drive them to slaughter, while the masses think they are guiding themselvs to a haven of rest. The present tariff law was a tax measure, and the sooner the people and Mr. Perry realize that fact the better off they will be. In 1861 there was cause for the law, and now there is none. Let us repeal it.

Your correspondent takes up the refrain of the paid tariff-for-protection speech-maker, and gets worried over the idea that all the nations of the world where manufacturing is done are scheming to get control of our markets. That is a point of no importance, yet as a sample of the logic of the protectionists I call attention to it. The United States hav abandoned the markets of the world, through the tariff system now in vogue, and England does not hav to compete with us. With the world to trade in, without our competition, what sense is there in saying that England seeks to get control of our markets? She is better off as she is. "English competition" is a phrase tossed here and there as a scare-phrase to frighten the timid. It amounts to nothing. Your advocate of protection follows the well-beaten pathway, by smacking his lips, glancing timidly about, and with pomp and bravado declaring for "Home markets for home productions!" How a man not a pensioner of the tariff for protection can speak those words, signifying such a narrow plan—a plan that has brought grief to the country once, and unless abrogated will again—and not instantly distrust the system that enforces such a rule, is more than I can see. Mr. Perry has doubtless heard of overproduction in certain lines of goods; probably he remembers the panic of 1873, and heard much about overproduction. We did most certainly hav an overproduction. There was no market for our products, and in a land of plenty, both of money and goods, we beheld the strange and inconsistent sight of men and families suffering, starving for the necessities of life. These are matters not soon forgotten, but the advocate of protection dislikes to be referred to the fact that all this occurred under this beautiful "Home markets for home products" system; but, as it is fact, they will hav to stand it. Now, if we had not been hemmed in by tariff laws at that time, and had had an open world to trade in, the crisis of 1873 would hav been much less severe. "Home markets for home products" is the slimmest, flimsiest, most wishy-washy argument now employed by the servants of the monopolists—an argument that any school-boy would know how to refute. As a solution of the tariff problem—as a good explanation of the principle involved—I would recommend any protectionist to sit down and first figure out how a tariff law would work between his own town and the next adjoining town, then apply it to counties, then to states, then to nations, and if he does not see the folly and injustice of the principle, then I will giv up his case as hopeless. I hope Mr. Perry will do this, as well as read again the history of the cause of the American Revolution.

As between the two great political parties there is not much to choose, I admit. The Democratic party is fairly mortgaged to the pope of Rome, and is largely controled by the rum element in this part of the country; but it is no worse off than the Republican party, for that is catering to the pope, and hopes to win a bow from him occasionally, besides having the church power at home backing it up, and its leaders are generally selfish monopolists, who use the party to further their own ends at the expense of everything else.

The Democratic party is much freer from the monopolistic element, and is championing a great principle at the expense, perhaps, of defeat, and has for its standard-bearer, not a brilliant public actor—a man seeking merely to win applause—but an honest, straightforward American citizen—a man whom I feel can be trusted even to resist the encroachments of the papal power should it become dangerous to our government—a man who will do what he thinks right, even though his party would be ruined thereby—a man of principle; and, unless other issues of more importance arise, I should advise all Liberals to vote for Cleveland and Thurman. M. A. B.

Mr. Guild's Moderately Stated Opinions.

F. D. Owen, a Missouri medicin man, thinks it stupid to try to stop the evil of intemperance, and he pleads for it as a curativ and a food, disingenuously asking, Where did liquor ever do as much mischief as a single battle? charging me, in spite of all the Atheistic articles of mine that hav appeared before his eyes in THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last two years, with being full of salvation oil and steeped in gospel grace. Very well; if such things hav helped me to hate liquor, so much credit to them; giv me some more; salvation oil is immeasurably better than benzine damnation any time. If, as he says, the egg of Prohibition was laid in the pulpit, hatched by the church, and the chick fed and nourished by the Temperance Union, then so much the better for its fosterers, though I do not giv them all the credit. That is the way copperheads in the North talked about Abolitionism. True or false, slavery was abolished all the same; and now who stands highest in honest and intelligent eyes—Daniel Webster and his dough-faced pseudo-Democrats, who said, "We hate slavery as badly as you do, but what can we do about it?" or Abraham Lincoln and his sturdy soldiers, who found a way to do it to death? The fact is, the curse of intemperance has got to be removed, according to the progress of evolution in morals as elsewhere, and if by no other way, then by war, whether it be welcome or not. It will take something more than a school-boy, even a sheepskinned one, to know that the British premier is wrong when he says that intemperance is worse than war, famin, and pestilence, or to upset Ingersoll's averment that "alcohol is the sum of all villainies, the father of all crime, the mother of all abominations"—but perhaps Dr. Owen won't own that Colonel Ingersoll spoke with intelligence.

It is an oft-quoted saying that twelve men on the part of the South, full of wine, carried the first ordinance of secession, which was decided upon in a drunken caucus the night before. I am now out in the country, so cannot look up my author. This, though, I hav with me:

> The war of the Rebellion was really a whisky war! Yes, whisky caused the Rebellion! I was in the United States Congress preceding the war. It was whisky in the morning—the morning cocktail—a Congress of whisky-drinkers. Then whisky all day; whisky and gambling all night. Drink before Congress opened its morning session; drinks before it adjourned. Scarcely a committee room without its demijohn of whisky; and the clink of the glasses could be heard in the Capitol corridors. The fights, the angry speeches, were whisky. The atmosphere was redolent of whisky—nervous excitement seeking relief in whisky, and whisky aiding nervous excitement. Yes, the Rebellion was launched in whisky. If the French Assembly were to drink some morning one-half that consumed in one day by that Congress, France would declare war against Germany in twenty minutes.—Gen. Daniel E. Sickles.

I am a Prohibitionist because, when I vote, I want to vote the way I shot. I would be a Republican because the Republicans were all Unionists, but they are not all against liquor, the greatest cause and occasion of disunion, and whoever serves liquor is an enemy of his country, however unwittingly. Giv me a temperance pledge in place of a secession ordinance in support of slavery. I think a Prohibition chick on the liberty pole much more appropriate than a drunken buzzard. So far as the liquor and tobacco tax is concerned, the Prohibitionists are like the emperor of China—they do not wish for revenue gleaned from the vices of the people. The cry of gluttony is paltry. People must eat or die, and if they eat too much, or too fast, that is an error, to be sure; but drink intoxicant at all they need not. It is not a food; it is not even medicin; it is not life, but death. You may laugh at me for that, but ask T. B. Wakeman. He will tell you: "Now, this excretion of this fruit-sugar eating animal is alcohol. All the alcohol in the world comes from this animal in just this way, and in no other" (Hall's Journal of Health). Sir Charles Napier told his soldiers in India: "Don't drink. If you drink you are done for. You will be either invalided or die." Said Prince Leopold, duke of Albany: "Drink is the only terrible enemy England has to fear." And Balzac: "People dread cholera, but brandy is a worse plague."

You can giv me sneers at length, I own, but I challenge argument. I am prepared to fight it out on the Prohibition line, if it takes a thousand years.

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

Does Religion Prolong Life?

Was the subject of a lecture delivered last Sunday morning by the Rev. Dr. Talmage, and of which a report is given in the Morning Journal of Monday, the 11th. Having read very carefully the report, I still fail to see that any of his arguments prove anything whatever in the affirmativ, therefore I venture a little criticism. Does religion prolong life? "Yes," says Talmage. But I answer, No. And in making the assertion the reverend preacher flatly contradicted himself. Hear him. He says, "It is high time that religion joined hands with medical science in attempting to improve human longevity." Now, in this statement lies the most damaging testimony it is possible for man to giv; for he practically admits that "medical science" can improve human longevity, but religion itself, pure and simple, utterly fails to do so. Yes, admits the preacher, science can improve human longevity—that science which the church has always hated, detested, ignored, slandered, and persecuted—that science which, when young, religion tried to strangle in the cradle. But now that science has become a mighty truth, now that she has blossomed forth in all her splendor, now that she and she alone has proclaimed the truth to the world, religion turns round and says, Let us shake hands and be friends. But that cannot be; their paths lie widely apart; they run diversely from each other. For science has to do with that which is open to our observation, which can be investigated, and requires proof of all it accepts to be true. On the other hand, religion has to do with that which can not be investigated, and believes that which it cannot prove to be true. Therefore the rise of the one must necessitate the downfall of the other. Which shall rise? I answer, Science. For science is truth, and truth must prevail; it will soar high on towering wing far above the reach of scorn, and sooner or later it must predominate over those who now abuse it. So far is religion from prolonging life that it has destroyed it willfully, and has led to human sacrifice; it has made life miserable, undesirable, and unendurable. How, then, does religion prolong life? When a poor wretch, weak in frame and incapable of taking his meed of subsistence from the world—when such an unfortunate sinks lower and lower, struggling in the battle of life, will religion bring him food to stay the cravings of his empty stomach? will it bring him flesh to his wasted limbs? blood to his empty veins, or quiet to his aching brain? Can it do this? If not, what is the use of it?

The preacher also said, "The whole subject to many people is odorous with chlorine and carbolic acid." Probably so to the timid, the ignorant, the weak, and the unintellectual, but to the average educated mind, chlorine and carbolic acid odors more of the chemist's laboratory, while religion odors of inquisitions, swords, bayonets, and Bibles.

The preacher attempted to prove his position by stating, "That a man cares for his health as a positiv Christian duty." Does Mr. Talmage forget the text, "Take no thought for the morrow," or if any be sick, to call in the elders of the church instead of reverting to that medical science which Mr. Talmage is so anxious to join hands with? Besides, is it not a positiv Christian duty to hurry away from this world (so full of sin and crime) to another world, whose very existence they hav no positiv proof of, but where sin and crime are no more? Then, again, I ask, How does religion prolong life? Religion, said the preacher, was a friend of longevity, because it took the worry out of our temporalities; for, when a man became a genuin Christian, he made over to God not only his affections, but his family, his reputation, his business—everything. God tells him when to buy and when to sell. Only fancy God walking about on the stock exchange, whispering into a Christian man's ear respecting what he is to buy and what he is not to buy! If God thus helps a Christian man in his business, one can easily understand why it is so many Christians fail and turn bankrupt. Poor fools! they placed their trust in God; and what a poor manager he must hav been!

But if this theory be true, how can they tell us that God is impartial? Are there not thousands who pray to him every day for success in business matters, and yet what a few ever become successful! Now, if I were a Christian, I should regard this language of the reverend doctor's as the most blasphemous and diabolical outrage that was ever laid at the shrine of my divinity. However, the only way to account for it is that the audience must hav been made up very largely from stock brokers, and the preachers wanted to say something that might touch their hearts and pockets as well. Religion's bright side is at the head of the article, and toward the conclusion of his address the reverend gentleman attempted in some way to describe it.

He said: "Do you want reunion? There are your dead children waiting to kiss you, waiting to embrace you, waiting to twist garlands in your hair," etc. What a beautiful picture, and one well worthy of a Talmage! But is this bright scene to be enjoyed by all? I am afraid not, if the Christian doctrin be true. For, according to the teachings of this creed, heaven is to be the portion only of a favored few, while an eternity of horrible and hopeless misery awaits the vast majority of the human race. For nearly twenty centuries this dreadful belief has weighed like a nightmare on the minds of men. Who shall number the multitudes whose lives it has embittered, and whose parting moments it has filled with terror and despair? Religion's bright side, indeed! There is no bright; they are both dark, and it is, indeed, difficult to say which is the darker and more repulsiv of the two. I ask again, Where is religion's bright side? Echo answers, Where? In conclusion, I assert that religion does not prolong human life. I assert that it is immoral; and it is unjust; it is not above nature, but below it; it is not ethereal, but gross. Men are learning, however, though many of them in secrecy and stealth, to break their mental fetters, and very soon our posterity will gaze back with astonishment at the hideous nightmare which has appalled and oppressed so many of their ancestors.

New York City's Worldliness.

The Evening Post has been inquiring into the religious status of this great city, and the result of the gathered statistics is not at all satisfactory to any Protestant denomination but the Episcopalian. That sect alone shows gains in membership commensurate with the gain in population.

The addition to the number of our inhabitants for the decade from 1880 to 1890 will probably equal 400,000. Allowing, then, for an addition of 200,000 during the last five years, or 15.38 per cent, it appears that the increase in the combined Protestant denominations in the same period has been only 13.03 per cent, or, in actual numbers, about 10,000 merely. The showing would be very much worse for the churches were it not for the extraordinary growth of the Episcopalians, who hav gained nearly one-third, or 31.74 per cent. Leaving the Episcopal church out, the rest of the denominations hav gained only 3.12 per cent, as against a gain of nearly five times as much in population. The Post's figures are:

Episcopal	19,650	25,733	33,903
Presbyterian	18,773	21,520	23,016

So far as the minor sects, the Universalists, Unitarians, Friends, Swedenborgians, etc., are concerned, the Post says, the case may be summed up by saying that none of them are as strong to-day as they were five years ago. The Lutheran church, with considerable accessions by immigration, barely manages to hold its own.

The result of the Post's labors, therefore, is the knowledge that here in New York city no Protestant denomination is holding its own except the Episcopalian. Catholicism is, of course, gaining largely by immigration and by natural increase of the resident Catholics, who multiply and replenish the earth in frequency proportioned to their ignorance. The result is seen in our reformatories, penitentiaries, and workhouses; and the state and country and city are constantly asked to increase their annual donations to Roman Catholic charitable institutions.

One vital and interesting point the Post fails to find among the church statistics it has overhauled, and that is whether the increase of any denomination is due to conversions from Infidelity, or is subtracted from other denominations, and due, therefore, to "superior attractions." "What we would like to know," says the Post, "is whether the Episcopal church is invading the territory of the Infidel, or is only gathering to itself the sheep brought into the Christian fold by the shepherds of other denominations. In other words, does its large increase represent a substantial growth of Christianity, or only an enlargement of a particular kind of denominationalism." The Post can find only one satisfactory reason for the growth of Episcopalianism, however, and that is "undoubtedly its latitudinarianism. On the one hand, it permits declarations that would cause no surprise if they emanated from a Unitarian pulpit, and on the other it tolerates practices that would be heartily commended by the Propaganda of Rome. This opens a wide field for personal initiativ, guarantees an activ ministry, and is undoubtedly a source of numerical strength."

This is perhaps true. A great many people attend the Episcopal churches who are much more heretical as regards belief in creeds than the attendants upon other Protestant places of worship, such as the Baptist, Congregational, or Methodist. This, too, in spite of the ritualistic tendency of many Episcopalian rectors. Outward form is the desire and religion of thousands of so-called Christians. They are the scribes and Pharisees whom Jesus described as paying tithe of mint and cummin and neglecting the weightier matters of law and faith. Episcopalianism is fashionable, and the church makes its inroads upon other denominations by offering a service that is more attractiv to lovers of form and show, and preaching sermons less repellent to those who hav renounced the main doctrins of Christianity and accepted the statements of science. The Dixes, uncle and nephew, stand for the reactionary element, while Heber Newton may be classed among the latitudinarians.

There is perhaps another reason. The intellectual spirit of New York is heretical, and that spirit has induced great numbers of people, both in and out of the sects, to abandon the church to the nursery; while it has induced others to draw closer to the standard of orthodoxy. These latter individuals would naturally drift to Episcopalianism. Under the flowing folds of the rector's surplice they can tuck their heads and rest their little minds from the turmoil stirred up by the scientists and philosophers, who hav disturbed the foundations of Christianity by their inconvenient discoveries and speculations. The service is stereotyped, the preachers possess ample stocks of platitudes for their sermons, and there is absolutely no mentality required in worshiping in one of their churches. Anybody who can read can be an Episcopalian.

It is rather surprising, though, to find that out of a population of a million and a half less than one hundred thousand are members of Protestant churches. It shows that, apart from the Catholics, the people of New York are an exceedingly worldly lot. And another, but less surprising, fact is that the criminal population comes from the Catholics, the most orthodox sect of all.

The Brazilian Emancipation of Slaves.

There is great rejoicing among the Brazilians over the abolition of slavery in the empire of Brazil, and the Rio de Janeiro papers describe the whole population as being overcome with noble emotion. The city was hung with banners, the citizens marched in gay procession, bands of music played as they paraded, and the feast of freedom was turned into a carnival of glory. As usual, however, the priests are taking to themselvs the credit for the abolition, and "in order to giv the great act of abolition a sacred character the senate held a Sunday session for its adoption, and the princess regent put her signature to it on the same day." Latterly, too, the history of a Catholic saint, who is said to hav preached abolition in Brazil, has been written up, and the pope has felicitated the Catholic church upon "her work for the destruction of slavery."

Were this true, we would be the last to rob the church of her glory. She has need of all the charity that can be shown to her, for her sins to be covered are enormous and innumerable. But the Brazilian slaves do not owe their freedom to religion, any more than do the American negroes. Dom Pedro, the emperor, is the individual who has emancipated the South American blacks, and he is a Rationalist, as is well known, though apparently the fact is forgotten. He accepts no form of Christianity for himself as a man, though as emperor he is bound to take part in religious ceremonies and allow the impression to be held by his people that he is a Roman Catholic. But he is a promoter of scientific schools and researches, a patron of art, an advocate of education and freedom, and a thorough Rationalist. His extensiv travels hav broadened his views, his knowledge of languages has enabled him to become familiar with English and German philosophy, and he is a nineteenth century gentleman instead of a narrow Roman Catholic tyrant ruling a tropical empire.

In his attempting to liberate the slaves he met with opposition from his senate and from the aristocracy of the country, but by wise and prudent measures he has succeeded, after fifteen years, in winning them to his views, and now we are told that there seems to hav been hardly a sign of opposition, either in the senate or among the people, to the act of abolition. And yet the Catholic church, whose priests hav owned slaves, and still as good as own thousands of serfs in Mexico, is claiming the honor of the great humanitarian act! Can impudence go farther?

Tacking a "sacred character" to the abolition act was a hideous farce, for when and where does history show that any "sacred" organization ever inaugurated a movement for liberating slaves? Not in Spanish America, for from the conquest down to the present century the church in that country has rivaled the largest landowners in the number of slaves it held. Not in the British West Indies, for it is a matter of record that the English church opposed that emancipation. Not in the Southern states of this country, for everybody knows what the pious believers in "sacred scriptures" did against the negro in this country. The chosen people of God held slaves, and nowhere in the Bible is there a proclamation of total emancipation. The church has been dragooned to do all she has ever done for the slaves, and she never took much interest in carrying the gospel to them till they had money to pay for it.

The Catholic church is the hugest humbug in this world.

Mr. Pentecost, Agnostic.

We heartily congratulate the Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost upon his sermon of the 17th inst.

Since Mr. Pentecost left his orthodox congregation of Newark, N. J., and set up as an independent preacher at Masonic Hall, his mental growth has been constant and encouraging. At first he stepped out gingerly, as became a man treading paths to him unknown, but with every mile traveled he has become bolder and firmer in his walk. His experience has been that of many preachers—from orthodoxy to a sort of Unitarianism, then to something like "Free Religion," and on to Agnosticism, which is Atheism practically—and if in some of his sermons he has talked as though the experience were his alone, and he had had no predecessors, he can easily be forgiven the egotism, for he is a brilliant and brave young man, true to his principles and eager in the search for truth.

The sermon of the 17th marks his onward step to Agnosticism. He seems to hav taken himself into his own confidence—confessed his heart to his brain—and then told his congregation the result. The confession is interesting. "Suppose," he said, "that we should suddenly awake and find ourselvs on board a ship in mid-ocean, sailing onward rapidly without knowing whence the ship came or whither she was going. Suppose that we should discover that all our fellow-passengers were in the same condition of ignorance as to her destiny and origin, that all were born on shipboard, and that nothing was known of this vessel, except that she had always been going and had always been out of sight of land, with no captain, no pilot, no chart, and no crew. Add to this supposition that each passenger knows that as he sees one of his fellows fall overboard and disappear forever, so, too, must he some day inevitably perish in like manner."

This, said Mr. Pentecost, is the condition of the human race. "We hav but two certainties here; that we liv, and that we shall die. Beyond this all is guesswork, mystery, and ignorance. We know nothing as to the origin of things. The Bible says that God is the source of all things, which he produced out of nothing; that he created the world out of nothing. But unfortunately this is not a solution of the question; it teaches us nothing. Such a proposition is open to three objections. First, it assumes the existence of God, of which we know nothing; second, it assumes that the universe was created from nothing; and, third, it proves too much. If God was the designer of the world, he in turn must hav had a designer, and so with that designer of God, and so on ad infinitum, which is unthinkable. In order to accept this theory of the creation a man must stop thinking, which is precisely what all Christians do. I hav no objection to anybody being a Christian, but you cannot be a Christian unless you consent to believe certain doctrins which will not bear investigation. And yet the Christians denounce the Spiritualists, who believe in things done in the dark! But they ought to see that any doctrin which does not submit to the closest scrutiny is conscious of its weakness and fraudulent character. When a man persists in asserting what he knows he does not know he becomes what the sweet-spirited disciple John calls a liar."

This is plain talk from one who but a few months ago supposed he knew the origin and destiny of the universe as well as he knew the multiplication table, and could solve all the questions of the past and future as easily as he could find the contents of a cube. Now that he knows how little he or any other preacher knows of any other world, he will perhaps confine himself to the improvement of this.

But that is not all upon which we congratulate Dr. Pentecost. "The Christians say," he continued, "that the Bible teaches that God exists and created the world. The Christian assumes that the Bible is infallible. The difficulty with this assumption is that there are so many things about the Bible we don't know. We don't know who wrote the books of Moses or of Samuel. It has been proven that David never wrote one of the Psalms attributed to him. In short, the authorship of not a single book in the Old Testament is definitly known, and the same criticism applies to the New Testament. Who are the authors of the four gospels, the Acts and epistles, and the book of Revelation? For one hundred and seventy-five years after the birth of Christ not one of those gospels is referred to in contemporary literature. Such a book as that cannot be an infallible authority. If God himself were to tell me that a man lived in a fish's stomach for three days, that the waters of the Red sea were parted so that a whole nation passed through them on dry land, that a man had been raised from the dead after he had begun to decompose, I don't see how I could believe such statements. The Bible stories are as extravagant as fairy tales."

Mr. Pentecost has got his eyes open, evidently. He knows that Christianity is false not only in generals but in particulars—that the New Testament religion is no truer than the Old Testament cosmogony. When he realizes that the New Testament religion has kept the world back as much as the Old Testament conception of the origin of the universe has retarded science, he may feel that the one supreme duty of life is to remove that religion from the minds of the present and future generations. The iconoclast, the destroyer of idols and superstitions, is the workman needed to-day. There are more than enough builders of sham structures which topple over at the first breath blown by the logician upon them, and what is wanted is a clearing of the ground. Mr. Pentecost sees the falsehoods which hamper the race, and it is to be hoped he will tell the people what he sees with persistent frankness. He will do more good in that way than by glossing over the fables of theology and trying to make allegories or symbolic teaching of them. Christianity is not partly true and partly false. Christ was either the son of God or he was not. The atonement scheme is either true or false. Heaven does or does not exist. And if the affirmativ of these propositions of theology be true, everyone should be a Christian. If the negativ be true, then Christianity should be swept from the earth as a false guide, a misleader of men, a useless system, engrossing time and effort that should be given to the real improvement and progress of humanity. There is no logical resting-place between orthodoxy and Infidelity—between the asceticism of a slavish faith and fear and the cultivated manhood of an enlightened and scientific Rationalism.

The Difference.

In one of his lectures Colonel Ingersoll says:

"When your child commits a wrong, take it in your arms; let it feel your heart beat against its heart; let the child know that you really and truly and sincerely love it. Yet some Christians, good Christians, when a child commits a fault, drive it from the door and say: 'Never do you darken this house again.' Think of that! And then these same people will get down on their knees and ask God to take care of the child they hav driven from home. I will never ask God to take care of my children unless I am doing my level best in that same direction. But I will tell you what I say to my children: 'Go where you will; commit what crime you may; fall to what depth of degradation you may; you can never commit any crime that will shut my door, my arms, or my heart to you. As long as I liv you shall hav one sincere friend.'"

The Grand Rapids, Mich., Telegram-Herald of Tuesday of week before last printed this item:

"Judge Severens did a kindly act yesterday. Asa Kingsbury, the boy who was brought down from Mecosta county for opening letters that belonged to a couple of young ladies, was brought up for sentence. Kingsbury said that he was fifteen years old and had been arrested before. He said that his father was a minister and that his mother died in 1878, his father marrying again. Judge Severens said that the boy had not had proper training, even though his father was a clergyman, and that the crime charged was not bad enough to place upon the boy's name a stain that would be for life. So he would do a father's act and suspend sentence, Kingsbury promising never to get into trouble again. Turnkey Lewis let him stay at the jail last night and he will try and get work to-day. His father has not done a single thing for him, not even to write him a letter, letting his boy get through the best he could, and yet he is a minister of the gospel."

Probably this minister has preached many a sermon against "Ingersollism," and probably enough he has denounced the colonel as the incarnation of all that is bad. But what child would not rather be treated as Colonel Ingersoll treats his children than as the preacher of Mecosta county treats his?

We may add, too, for the benefit of the godly, that Judge Severens is honored in the town where he resides for being a stanch Freethinker.

The Pious London School Board.

Arthur B. Moss, of London, whose contributions to THE TRUTH SEEKER hav made him favorably known to the Freethinkers of America, is suffering a petty and spiteful persecution from the pietists of his city.

Mr. Moss is a school-teacher as well as a "Freethought and Radical advocate," and so subject to the London school board's orders. During his leisure time Mr. Moss has been lecturing before Freethought and the political Radical societies, as well as writing for the Freethought press. His interest in these reforms compels him to take whatever part in them will be of advantage. When the Oaths bill was up for a second reading in Parliament he wrote his member, J. R. Kelly, asking that gentleman to be in his place to vote favorably upon the bill. The letter, says Mr. Moss, was a respectful and inoffensiv one, "and might hav been written by any earnest Christian calling upon another Christian to be true to his principles." Unfortunately for Mr. Moss, however, on the back of the note paper appeared the statement that he was a Freethought lecturer. But there was nothing in or on the letter indicating that the writer was in the employ of the school board, and to find that out the Tory member of Parliament had to make inquiries for himself. Upon obtaining this information Mr. Kelly wrote to the chairman of the school board, the Rev. J. Dibble, asking whether a man holding the "repulsiv and blasphemous doctrins" of Mr. Moss was a fit and proper person to teach a London school.

Thereupon Mr. Moss was cited before the board, and questioned at length concerning his theological opinions. He defended himself boldly as a Freethinker, informing the reverend chairman and his associates that they had no right to interfere between him and his representativ in Parliament, and further that his private beliefs were none of the school board's business, and he was not responsible to the board for them whatever they might be. After a lengthy discussion the board adopted resolutions ordering Mr. Moss to cease lecturing upon Sundays, to discontinue writing for the press, to discontinue selling his pamphlets, and to write a letter to Mr. Kelly to say that his conduct shall not be repeated. Concerning these orders of the board Mr. Moss says:

"Had my character been anything short of exemplary, I should, without doubt, hav been discharged forthwith; but I am allowed to retain my berth on condition that I conform to these resolutions. Long experience having taught me that I cannot earn enough by lecturing alone to keep myself, to say nothing of my wife and two children, I hav no option, for the present, but to obey the first resolution. The others I will consider. As to my pamphlets, Mr. Bradlaugh publishes two and Mr. Foote two, and I am quite sure they would not cease to sell them if a thousand school boards were to command. But with regard to the others, I may say that I hav invested almost all my savings in them, and I trust to my friends throughout the country to see that I do not lose it all. And finally, with respect to Mr. Kelly, all I can now say is that the first time he presents himself before his constituents I shall be present to move a vote of censure on him for his conduct, and I hope the Camberwell friends will rally round and support me by their presence and their votes."

The unfairness and Christian bigotry of the board is clearly apparent. There are scores of school-teachers in London who devote their Sundays to teaching and practicing religion, and it is only because Mr. Moss is a Freethinker that he is debarred from publicly explaining his principles. The Rev. J. Dibble himself is a professional preacher of Christianity, though any rule which affects the school-teachers ought certainly to apply to the more important position of chairman of the school board. There is no rule or resolution forbidding Christians to write for the Christian press, nor forbidding them to sell Christian tracts, and every Christian teacher in London is perfectly free to write his member of Parliament urging that functionary to pursue a certain course in voting. Freethinkers alone are debarred from doing these things.

Mr. Moss submits just so far as circumstances and lack of cash compel him to, and no farther. In this he is both wise and brave. The victims of the Inquisition submitted because they had to, and died because they could not help it. Upon the church rests the infamy of their execution, and upon the church will rest the sin of a brave man's silence when he knows he should speak out. This persecution shows the tyranny of Christianity in power, and furnishes an additional reason for increased effort on the part of Freethinkers.

Editorial Notes.

CHARLES WATTS says in Secular Thought:

"Clark Braden is, in our opinion, beneath the notice of any man who has any respect for truth, honesty, and decency. We fear that he is past all moral redemption. We think that Mr. S. P. Putnam treated him recently in Oakland just as he deserved."

Mr. Watts has had experience and knows whereof he speaks.

J. E. REMSBURG has already lectured in more than three hundred cities and towns in the six states of Kansas, Illinois, Ohio, Iowa, Texas, and New York—in Kansas 79, Illinois 57, Ohio 50, Iowa 47, Texas 38, New York 32. He has also lectured in from twenty to thirty cities and towns in each of the following states: Missouri, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Michigan.

THE American Idea, of Liberal, Mo., announces its final suspension and a transferal of its subscription list to E. C. Walker's Fair Play. The disagreement in the town about the "Freethought University" has been severe, and awakened much ill-feeling, as may be seen in Mr. Walser's recent letter to us and in Professor Leahy's reply in this issue. Hints are dropped that a new and conservativ, if not Christian, journal will soon emanate from Liberal.

CLINTON FISK, the presidential candidate of the Prohibitionists, is very pious, and proclaims himself the representativ of all the morality there is in politics this year. But General Fisk to-day is under bonds of $75,000 on an order of arrest in a suit brought by Francis A. Fogg to recover about $70,000, of which Fogg says Fisk defrauded him. The order of arrest was issued by Judge Donohue on April 11, 1882. Mr. Fogg made affidavit that Fisk induced him to go into several mining enterpriscs, representing them as sound when Fisk knew to the contrary. Verily, the gap between preaching and practice is enormous.

A LEAGUE for the Separation of the Church and State has been established in Paris, of which M. Yves Guyot is president. It is proposed to effect this separation in detail, Mr. Bradlaugh explains in the National Reformer, by the exercise of a sort of local option. This is to be done by apportioning to each commune through France the full and completc control over its proportion of the sum annually voted for the cost of public worship. Communications should be addressed to Monsieur C. Jouffrault, Député, Secrétaire Général de la Ligue pour la Séparation des Eglises and de l'Etat par les Communes, 7 Rue Nicole, Paris.

THE Liberals of Australia are fighting over Anarchy. David A. Andrade is a Freethinker plus Anarchy; Joseph Symes is a Freethinker plus Republicanism. Both gentlemen belong to the Freethought association, and from its platform teach their respectiv political faiths. Anarchy, however, is not popular, and Mr. Symes and his friends are endeavoring (and perhaps hav succeeded by this time) to expel Mr. Andrade and the other Anarchists. The quarrel is bitter and will hurt the cause of Freethought, for Mr. Andrade is one of the most earnest and intelligent Freethinkers in Australia, though we cannot commend his course in seeking to attach Anarchy to the Freethought association.

Letters from Friends.

MONTREAL, June 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber only for a short while, but in that time hav found THE TRUTH SEEKER to be all that it is warranted, it being outspoken and candid in its opinions, while at the same time dealing justice to all. Being a Liberal myself, allow me in closing to wish all success to the paper and the cause it so strongly advocates.

JOHN R. CONWAY.

HAVANA, N. Y., June 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I expect to be a life member and take your excellent paper while I liv, and when I die I hope my friends will send you a notice. I liv in an ignorant, bigoted, and superstitious community; hav tried by persuasion and argument to get a subscriber to your paper, but hav failed to get one. I stand alone, but none the less firmly for truth. My regards to all subscribers, and especially to yourself for furnishing us so good a paper. N. E. KNOX.

STOCKTON, MO., May 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav failed to get even one subscriber, but I must hav the paper. A great many people in my neighborhood insult a man for offering them the paper to read. You know, they might learn some truths calculated to hurt their feelings. I think I will send for some books soon. But you cannot imagin how uncomfortable it is to liv in a place where all your neighbors are full of superstitious ignorance.

I append the namcs of a few friends to whom you may send sample copies. LEWIS R. WILLIAMS.

GENESEO, ILL., June 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: On Saturday, May 12th, Robbie Lambach, of Princeton, Iowa, died of malignant diphtheria, aged fourteen years. Robbie was a manly, noble, obedient, and intelligent boy, and an especial favorit with all who were acquainted with him. His mind, though so young, was perfectly free from the pernicious influence of sectarian dogma. He was a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and was a correspondent of the Children's Corner. In his death humanity, as well as his parents, hav lost the promis of a noble man. L. G. BARNES.

LOUISVILLE, KY., June 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: One copy of your last edition is worth a year's subscription. The illustrations and reading matter are splendid. Don't let anything Colonel Ingersoll writes or says escape you. Please publish every word of his that can be procured. I hav not taken your paper very long, but am glad to be able to truthfully say the Children's Corner pleases my little folks mighty well. The illustrations please all of us, and your editorials are right up alongside of any I ever read. They come up to the highest standard. My wife and child would like to see more from Si Slokum and his Badger boy. I inclose stamps for three sample copies to be sent to the friends' addresses given below.

WILLIAM T. CARTER, M.D.

OLYMPIA, W. T., June 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: If you will allow me to encroach upon your valuable space, I will say to the friends of liberty that our friend C. B. Reynolds has just departed from our town, after giving a course of four lectures to large and appreciativ audiences, who listened with untiring interest to the eloquent orations. After his having clearly shown the absurdities and false claims of the Bible and Christianity, the orthodox in their usual way retreated to the "last ditch," and there intrenched themselvs in the slime of superstition by saying that he just picked out the passages that suited his purpose. Knowing that, he told them to read the whole stories to which he referred. Not an orthodox was brave enough to stand up and defend his creed, though opportunities were given at the close of each lecture to do so. They can completely demolish the Infidels and all their arguments—"in their minds"—when they are in the "coward's castle," but when the foe appears they are like the Irishman's flea—when you put your finger on him he isn't there. But the day is not far distant when he must be there, and also giv a reason for his presence, or he will find he will soon be nowhere. The human race has now arrived at an age where they begin to ask the question, Why? and will no longer accept mere statements without the reason why. BENJ. TROYER.

DUNKIRK, N. Y., June 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed fifty cents, for which send the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS for 1887 and 1888. I think these books contain the most good reading, for the price, of any publications I know of. Besides, there are the pictures of those who hav thought and lived and written before our time. I wish to compare those pictured faces with the originals of some persons whom I saw, at a place which certainly was one of amusement to me—a Free Methodist prayer-meeting. Those sisters—how can I describe them? They were ancient maidens; single maidens; saved, washed, purified, and belonged wholly to God. One sister arose to testify that she was so glad, oh, so glad that she had renounced the flesh, the world, and the evils of this world, and had given herself wholly to God. I was wicked enough to smile. What a precious prize God must possess in such a tribe of prim, bony old maids, swathed in the plainest and scantiest of robes! And such prim countenances, too—only when their mouths are opened to say, "Bless the Lord!—bless his name!—o—o—oh!" And such front brains, too! I did not see one whose nose and forehead would not form an angle of thirty-two degrees, and then the worst part was covered with one of those plain, plain, plain Free Methodist bonnets, set down over those few ancient, precisely scraped locks of hair which always adorn the heads of pious people. A receding forehead and piety always belong together. When one sister knelt down to pray, she suddenly cried out, "O Lord!" It might hav been from pain in her ancient joints or it might hav been from her heart—I don't know. "Poor old maids!"—poor old fools! If they had not "renounced their flesh" and had given their hearts to some sensible man, they would not be such persecuted saints as they are now.

But I will close, wishing success to the best of good papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all who contribute or subscribe to it. A TRUTH SEEKER.

LEON, KAN., June 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a new subscriber for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, the great barrier to orthodoxy, which should be in every household of America.

If the people of the world in general would read THE TRUTH SEEKER more and the Bible less, there would be more happiness and less misery and superstition in this life. We find that crimes of every kind hav been sanctioned by the God of the Bible, and that the perpetrators of such are the followers of its infernal teachings.

There are a great many Liberals in this country who do not take the iconoclast of America, THE TRUTH SEEKER, on account of hard times, and there are some who do not take it because it is more popular to cling to the church and its damnable and superstitious doctrins. Some time in the near future I shall giv the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER my experience in the religious circles of the past. The veil which hung between the church and the religion of nature had only to be lifted in order to show that there were two sides to the question.

Long may Col. R. G. Ingersoll, Mr. Heston, and the contributors of THE TRUTH SEEKER liv to crush out of the minds of the coming generation the obnoxious principles of orthodoxy. Yours for liberty and truth, T. W. BUTCHER.

PRINCETON, KAN., June 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Permit a stranger to encroach on your time. My father, J. P. Martin, for a long time a subscriber to your paper and a lover of our mutual friend D. M. Bennett, has passed away. His last business transaction was to pay up the arrears on your paper, which he could not do without. I would be very glad if you would put an obituary in your paper. According to his written request, no minister officiated at his funeral, but we read that beautiful service for the dead written by Austin Holyoake, taken from the "Truth Seeker Collection of Forms and Hymns," which my father sent for this winter, so, as he laughingly expressed it, as to be ready for emergencies to keep the priests away. We are the only family of Liberals here. The service was read by a friend. The hymns, "Scatter Seeds of Kindness" and "The Beautiful River," were sung. A beautiful wreath was placed on his coffin, and also on his grave.

I will giv you a few more items: The deceased J. P. Martin was 81 years 6 months and 1 day of age. He was partially paralyzed on the 28th of May, and died on the 29th, but not one word of complaint or fear escaped his lips; trying to cheer me, his daughter, to the last. He retained his reason until the last, and his last words were taken from the piece entitled, "The Sleep of Death:"

'Tis a long, 'tis a last, 'tis a beautiful rest,
When all sorrow is passed from the brow and the breast,
And the lone spirit truly and wisely may crave
The sleep that is dreamless—the sleep of the grave.

Please send his paper to me, and oblige,

Yours in sorrow, MRS. EMMA ALFORD.

ITHACA, NEB., June 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to ask J. P. Guild, whose article appears in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 2d, how he knows that one out of every thousand of the population of the United States dies a drunkard. Is it not possible that Prohibitionists claim an over number of deaths from alcoholic drink? I hav known persons to die who were eighty or ninety years old who once in a while drank to excess; these persons were always called victims of alcohol by the Prohibitionists, yet they lived much longer then the average of the Prohibitionists. Mr. Guild claims that there are sixty thousand of our population who die drunkards every year. I deny it, and ask for the proof. He says: "If one in every thousand of our population was sacrificed on the altars of worship, what an outcry there would be!" I claim, and I believe I can nearly prove it, that there are more deaths caused by religionists in various ways than by alcohol. Take, for instance, a religious revival in the fall of the year. The audience expose themselvs and their children to the night air, thinly dressed; are generally heated up in their religious fandango, and then go out in the cold air going home. I hav known whole neighborhoods sick from this cause alone. Then at their church festivals, where they hav unwholesome diet for one day; many are made sick then. To say nothing of the many who are crazed by religion.

I presume that Mr. Guild is a Prohibitionist. There are only a few Liberals who are Prohibitionists. I call them illiberal Liberalists. At least, they propose dictating to the people. They claim that the people need guardians, and I say they want to be the guardians, and thus they could dictate to the people what they might eat and drink. I do not want any dictation in mine. He says that the cost of liquor is greater than the cost of war. I think it is mean for a Prohibitionist to talk that way. Who made it cost so much but the Prohibitionist who was the cause of the high tariff on liquor and the high license? Liquor used to cost only fifteen cents per gallon.

If Mr. Guild had waited and read Mr. Owen's article on Prohibition, he might hav saved some of his clubs for better use.

Is it not a fact that nearly half of our population die before they are twenty-five years old? Alcohol does not kill all these. It is a further fact that the people who use beer, wine, and buttermilk, all of which contain alcohol, are as healthy on an average as those who liv on tea and coffee. Then, is there any reason that people who use beer should pay more government and other taxes than those who use coffee and tea—especially as coffee and tea are not grown in our country, while beer is? Alcohol is an essential element of our existence. It is in all the food we eat. It is the principle of fermentation, or souring, the first process of decomposition. Without this principle our victuals would never digest, and corn, wheat, or anything else would never grow. I am willing to admit that a healthy person does not need any more alcohol than is in his food, if he has good, healthy food, but there are times that the system needs alcohol. When, from various causes, the system is out of order, then our Prohibition fanatics would hav such laws that we would hav to get a physician's certificate before we could get any alcohol, thus making classes and dictators in our government. We hav enough of them now. JOHN BRYAN.

MR. EDITOR: In looking over one of the last issues of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I spied the letter from F. D. Owen, M.D., and was very much surprised to see a doctor uphold the use of liquor. Liquor is well enough in its place; that is, when used for medical purposes. But this letting every man put up a grog-shop on the corner of every street is absurd folly. How many families hav been ruined by the use of liquor! How many people hav been driven to lying, stealing, and murdering by its use who when in their right mind would shrink with abhorrence from such!

And, my friend, when you state that there is only one man out of a hundred that is a habitual drunkard, I think you are very much mistaken, for there certainly are fifty out of every hundred that are natural drunkards. I hav seen case after case, right here in this village, where boys not more than seventeen years of age would get so intoxicated by liquor that they would be obliged to lie down in a ditch for hours until they recovered from their drunken stupor. What could you call such but natural drunkenness?

Liquor has been the means of saving people, but it has killed more than it has ever saved. It may stay the waste of tissue, in entering the red blood corpuscles, but at the same time it eats from the stomach the mucous membrane, which is one of the principal organs of digestion. The result of such, if too often indulged in, is dyspepsia. So if there is not some law to prevent liquor-selling, great numbers of men will fall into drunkards' graves.

I think that when a person talks about liquor's not being sold free enough, he certainly does get the bridle on the wrong end of the horse; and he will go backward and the gutter will receive him.

I say it is not right to perch anything above the American eagle, but of the two, I would a great deal rather see the Prohibition chick there than a dirty whisky-barrel.

RÖCHLITZ, BEI REICHENBERG, BÖHMEN, May 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The grand TRUTH SEEKER I receive every week. I am a stranger in my birthplace. A new generation has grown up since thirty-six years. I hav to learn the manners and customs. I would like that this people here accept some of the manners and customs of America, and the American some of the customs of this country. Both countries would benefit. In machinery they are here fifty years behind-time. I am an American citizen yet, and will be as long as I liv and a piece of the Constitution is left. This is a Roman Catholic country. I went to church last Sunday forenoon and heard high mass, but the Holy Ghost did not come near me. In the church I saw some aged people and a few school-children; the church half empty. On the way home I saw the stores all open and commerce as lively as any day. I met a load of hay on the street, and the farmers were plowing and harrowing in the afternoon. I went in the beer-houses but could hardly find a place to sit down. People were at eight or ten tables, all drinking beer. Their time is split up in work, sleep, and music and beer. The majority of the people do not know anything about Liberal religion. Their own religion they cannot believe, because the priests giv them a bad example. The priests make themselvs their heaven here by obtaining all the money they can and letting the hereafter take care of itself. If a person gets sick, religion or no religion, they send for the priest, and the priest givs the dying person the holy sacrament, and he goes straight to heaven or purgatory. End good, all good. There is no Sunday to speak of except the beer-houses are full and dancing commences at 4 P.M. and lasts till after 12 at night. Everyone is a Sabbath-breaker. But they get a good harvest—no epidemic, no earthquakes; this God here never gets angry like the one in America.

Will some one please answer this question: Hav we a universal God, or one god to every country, or none at all?

Fraternally, JOSEPH WENZEL.

ANAHEIM, CAL., June 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Anaheim, Los Angeles county, Cal., is situated twenty-seven miles southeast from Los Angeles city, on the Santa Ana branch of the Southern Pacific railway, also on the San Diego and Los Angeles main line. The distance from our lovely city to the grand, the beautiful Pacific is thirteen miles, over a beautiful plain, to the celebrated watering-place known as Anaheim landing, or Los Alamitas bay. The climate in this locality cannot be surpassed on this coast—no, not in sunny Italy. The days are ever pleasant and sunny; the nights are cool and invigorating; the air is perfumed throughout the year from the flowers and orange blossoms on every side and walk.

Anaheim was formerly a German town, and that nationality is yet in tbe majority, but in a walk of ten minutes one will hear six or seven languages spoken—namely, English, German, French, Spanish, Danish, and Italian.

The public school system cannot be surpassed in any state in the Union. Every school district must maintain at least eight months of school in each year. The fund to support it comes directly from the state. There is another grand feature in the school system here; that is, a public library belonging to each and every district. This also is supported by the state; $50 is set apart for each district annually for that fund. And no sectarian books or works are allowed therein. The teachers' salary ranges from $65 to $85 per month. Society in Anaheim and its surroundings is good; nothing to mar good order, except now and then a church scandal will creep out, but that can be no surprise to an impartial observer, as their authority givs many instances of the kind. A large percentage of the wealth and influence of lovely Anaheim is of the Liberal or Materialistic order; and let me state right here, it is a fine place to emigrate to. There is a fine opening here for a strictly scientific lecturer, gentleman or lady, to locate. We want a teacher, one who can giv us lessons in astronomy, geology, botany, chemistry, philosophy, social science, etc. It is useless, in my opinion, to tell others of their faults. Let us demonstrate scientific truths and they will see their faults themselvs. As Comte has well said: "The truly scientific conception has given over the vain search after absolute notions, the origin and destination of the universe, the causes of phenomena, and applies itself to the study of their laws, that is, of their invariable succession and resemblance." There may be spirits; there may be gods; there may hav been a time when time did not exist; there may hav been a time when space, matter, motion, and force did not exist; but we hav no data to prove it, and it is useless to talk about the unknowable and even unthinkable.

Now, in conclusion, I will state that there is a better opening for progressiv thought and happiness in Anaheim than in any other place I hav ever been in, Liberal, Mo., not excepted. St. John's described view of the New Jerusalem has no charms for me, compared with this really lovely land and climate.

Turn we eastward: mountains rise
Toward the clear and azure skies,
And a soft and rosy haze
Caused by Sol's descending rays,
Glimmers on each lofty head—
Turn we westward: there the bed
Of the broad Pacific gleams
Glorious with reflecting beams.

In the vale that lies between,
Groves, whose leaves of rich, dark green
Half conceal, in verdant light,
Golden fruitage from our sight,
Stand exultant; and the pear,
Peach and plum and fig are there;
Pomegranates, too, and limes,
Flourish in these favored climes—

Cottage homes 'mid palms and pines,
Olivs dark and fruitful vines,
Nestle in a wealth of flowers
Bright and fragrant; and the hours
Dreamful, charming, glide away
Through the still and sunny day;
And my friend, with glistening eyes,
Whispers: This is paradise.

HEPPNER, ORE., June 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Priestley's communication published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 19th, headed, "Mrs. Ritchey Set Right," has missed the mark. In the first place, it was not my desire to take prominent issue with THE TRUTH SEEKER. This notoriety has been forced upon me, and, while I regret it, the best I can do for the present is to take advantage of the situation.

If by quoting from Smith's Bible Dictionary, Mr. Priestley meant to convey the idea that the Bible teaches that the sky is a solid crystal or metallic expanse, having windows and doors, and to which the heavenly bodies are fastened, I fail to see it in that light. Smith did not believe this, for he knew the scripture also makes use of metaphors conveying the very opposit ideas to those of solidity or permanence. See Isa. xl, 22; Job xxvi, 8; Prov. xxx, 4; Ps. xviii, 11.

The author of the article quoted from by Mr. Priestley also says: "If it be objected to the Mosaic account that the view embodied in the word rakia does not harmonize with strict philosophic truth, the answer to such an objection is that the writer describes things as they appear rather than as they are. But in truth, the same absence of philosophic truth may be traced throughout all the terms applied to this subject, and the objection is leveled rather against the principles of language than anything else. Examin the Latin cælum, the 'hollow place,' or cave, scooped out of solid space; our own 'heaven;' i.e., what is heaved up; the Greek word, similarly significant of hight; or the German himmel, to cover the roof which constitutes the heim or abode of man—in each there is a large amount of philosophical error."

Another writer, commenting on the article above-mentioned, says: "We must distinguish the merely ideal and poetical imagery in later writings (Ps. civ, 3; 2 Sam. xxii, 8; Job xxvi, 11; xxxvii, 18) and in symbolic vision (Ezra i, 22–26), from the purely descriptiv, though manifestly phenomenal, representation in Genesis. In the latter it is also necessary to distinguish between the phenomena described and the processes which we may presuppose as being anterior to and the cause of them, but of which the sacred writer makes no account. . . . One stage among these mysterious processes was the separation of the waters enveloping the earth into waters above and waters below. The phenomenon to be described—not explained, but simply described as a phenomenon—is the unfailing supply of the former, poured down from time to time for ages without stint and never exhausted. It accords with the whole tone of this remarkable and unique document to describe this phenomenon as a separation of waters by a firmament (more properly expanse) interposed between the waters below and the waters above, dividing the one from the other. If in this same expanse the heavenly bodies are set, it is what we should expect in a style of representation which excludes minute circumstantial detail. . . . The description, therefore, is phenomenally true; nor can science urge anything against it, since the stars, though not in the same limit of space, are set in the same expanse. . . . The irrelevance of some references (as, for example, Ex. xxiv, 10; Isa. xiv, 12; xxxiv, 4) seems too obvious to require correction."

Science to-day cannot present a better word for the regions of space than the literal rendering of the word rakia—the expanse.

The Bible teaches no such absurdities. It givs hints of many scientific truths. Few are able to describe with more brevity and perspicuity the origin of rain and its distribution than does Elihu (Job xxxvi, 27, 28). The gravity of the atmosphere, regulation of rain by law, and the use of lightning seem to hav been well known to Job and his friends (Job xxviii, 24–26; comp. Ps. cxxxv, 7).

Many long years before the rotations and revolutions of the wind currents were demonstrated Solomon wrote as is recorded (Eccl. i, 6). Long before Newton, Galileo, and Copernicus were born Job talked of the inclination of the earth's axis and of its equilibrium in space (Job xxvi, 7). Isaiah wrote of the circle of the earth, and its insignificance in the eyes of the creator (Isa. xl, 22).

Mr. Priestley wants to know if I believe that the heavens and earth and all therein were created in six days (meaning, of course, days of twenty-four hours). I do not, nor does the Bible teach it. Every Bible reader knows, or ought to know, that the term day is used in the scriptures not simply to denote a period of twenty-four hours, but periods of time of various lengths. See Gen. ii, 4. Does it mean twenty-four hours there?

In referring to the first five books of the Bible it is customary to call them the books of Moses, but whether or no he was the author of them all is an unsettled question. In many cases, however, those who would prove that Moses was not the author of the Pentateuch allow themselvs to interpolate into the text a meaning of their own.

I hav not read the article on Chronology in the Encyclopedia Britannica; but as for the authority of the Septuagint during Ezra's time, I quote from Lyman's Historical Chart: "467 years B.C. Ezra collects and arranges the books of Old Testament. 277 B.C. the Septuagint translation of the scriptures." Proving conclusivly that the Septuagint translation was not in existence until about 190 years after the rearrangement of the Old Testament books by Ezra.

Mr. Priestley will oblige me by reading what Smith's Bible Dictionary has to say on this subject, as it is one which cannot be disposed of in a few brief sentences. See articles on Chronology, Septuagint, and Samaritan Pentateuch.

Mr. Priestley would hav conferred a favor by presenting a single indisputable fact in support of the somewhat rashly made statement that "man has existed on this earth at least hundreds of thousands of years," notwithstanding the law of population renders such an assumption simply preposterous. I am aware that relics hav from time to time been produced as evidences favoring this assumption, about the real antiquity of which, however, men of science are still contending.

On the harmony of the two genealogies of the gospels there is neither room nor occasion for me to say much here. To attempt to giv an adequate explanation would take too long. I will simply say that, if Mr. Priestley will clear his mind of prejudice and investigate a little more carefully, he will find that there need be no snag here to knock the bottom out of the boat.

The next topic worthy of discussion amounts to this: Why may not the matter of which the universe is composed be eternal? The reason why is plain and simple. It has been demonstrated that all known substances existing in nature are composed of several elements; but no compound can be eternal. This nebula or gas-cloud, which evolutionists assert is eternal, could not burn if it were not a compound. The fact of its being a compound, therefore, renders the idea of its being eternal a manifest absurdity.

No matter how simple the combination, no conviction is more irresistible than the belief that every combination of matter had a combiner. There was a distinct period of time when the several elements of which these substances are composed were brought together by a combining force—call it what you please, it is all the same to me.

Philosophers tell us that the ultimate particles of matter are indestructible by any application of human power; but they are not generally agreed that matter is naturally indestructible, and therefore eternal, for the satisfactory reason that none of them can tell what matter in its own nature is. "The science of matter and the science of mind agree perfectly in this, that all we know of either is simply the phenomena which they exhibit. We know not matter as it is in itself, but only as it affects our senses. We perceive certain qualities or properties of it, and these we embody in our definition, and beyond these we say nothing, because we know nothing."

Then, again, the universe "consists not of a philosophical abstraction called matter, nor yet of one substance known by that name, but of a great variety of material substances—oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, sulphur, iron, aluminum, and some fifty others already discovered." Hav we then some fifty-seven eternal beings? Or if any one of them is eternal, where did the others come from, and how did they get together in their present combinations? Remember, the law of inertia is a very important one. Every body continues in a state of rest, or of uniform motion in a straight line, unless acted on by some external force. Matter of itself can not begin to move, or assume a state of rest after being put in motion.

It will not do to try to account for the formation of an orderly universe from a chaotic mass of gaseous matter by learned discussions on electricity, magnetism, the laws of gravitation, molecular attraction, etc. The unresisted force of gravitation would, in much less than an eternity, draw all matter toward the center of gravity of the universe, and instead of a multiplicity of solar systems, with orderly orbital motion, there would be one vast mass of motionless matter. Common people certainly hav a right to ask what name shall be given to that mighty centrifugal force acting against the power of gravitation, and by means of which the movements of the universe are regulated. "Regulated power proclaims a regulator."

There is no inconsistency in my accepting the statement that like produces like (as far as species are concerned) along with the Bible account of the repeopling of the globe.

I deny that the distinction between varieties and species is indefinable. The distinctions between existing species are so well defined that, although not always at first apparent to man, they are known to the animals themselvs, and by their instincts made known to man. Not only this, but nature has drawn an indelible line of demarkation between them in the sterility of hybrids, while between varieties the exact reverse is the case.

I am aware that the imperfection of the geological records is a great resource of evolutionists. Mr. Darwin would never hav suspected them of such defectivness but for their failure to meet his demands. He could not find the connecting links between the species, which, on the theory of slight successiv modifications, ought to hav been a hundred times more plentiful than the species they connected. I will admit that, in this respect, the geological records are very imperfect.

Mr. Priestley has quoted from Professor Winchell's "Geological Studies" in order to prove that my statements are the "exact reverse of the truth." How does he reconcile this with the teachings of Agassiz (also quoted from), who, together with many other eminent geologists, did not believe that "the correspondence between the embryos of modern types and the adults of ancient types is a general principle in the history of life?" On the contrary, it is asserted that "at the earliest appearance of every species in the history of the earth's crust, the remains are found not only as highly organized and as perfectly differentiated as they ever afterward occur, but in most cases they are more completely developed and of larger and more powerful organization than they are ever found to be in subsequent geological strata, so degeneration is the rule rather than transmutation to higher forms." This last would appear to be more in accordance with the statement that "Mr. Huxley did not believe in a process of necessary progressiv development, because retrogression was a conspicuous fact."

Now, if the evidence in favor of the evolution theory is so plain, why such wide diversity of opinions?

Admitting, however, the evolution of the horse from the eohippus, still there are difficulties in the way. Evolution, as defined by its ablest advocates, means a change from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, from the simple to the differentiated. "Every part and organ of the horse came to be what it is by the same process of minute differentiation." By what process, then, of minute differentiation did the change take place from the differentiated foot of the eohippus to the homogeneous, clumsy hoof of the horse; and in what way could natural selection hav anything to do with it?

Then, again, the production of some five or six intermediate forms is not sufficient to prove the evolution of the horse from the marsupial on the theory of natural selection, which acts only by slight successiv variations. Such a leap as that from the three serviceable toes of the miohippus to the single toe of the protohippus would be fatal to this theory. But it seems strange that evolution should deprive an animal of any of its toes as long as it was supposed to hav been constantly using them.

"Creation is a theory unsupported by any fact." While space forbids a full discussion of this subject, I will say that if Mr. Priestley will kindly produce a single fact as undeniable proof that spontaneous generation ever did, or could, take place under the existing laws of nature, he will then hav a basis for his theory.

Evolutionists assert the chemical origin of life, notwithstanding the fact that chemical actions are antagonistic to life, and are constantly laboring to destroy the living organism until they finally succeed. This great gap between life and death cannot be bridged by a few strokes of the pen in the hands of an Infidel writer.

While Mr. Priestley is elucidating knotty points, there is something else I would like to hav explained. In every human body, about half-way down the intestins, is a peculiar projection about the size of a goose-quill, and three or four inches long, as near as I can guess at it. I would like to know what this is for, and why it is found only in the human system. Will Mr. Priestley please explain?

The only excuse I hav to offer for so lengthy an article is, that it ends the controversy as far as I am concerned. Mr. Priestley is at liberty to reply to this if he sees fit, but I would advise him the next time he attempts to set anyone right not to presume too much on the ignorance of his opponent.

Some of my TRUTH SEEKER friends seem to be laboring under a delusion. That "noble old man" was not my tutor either in paleontology or respecting the law of expansion. My authority on the latter is Norton's "Elements of Philosophy."

The Massachusetts delegation
That signed our glorious Declaration
Were Hancock, Gerry, Robert Paine,
The great John Adams, and again
Another Adams—Samuel by name.

New Hampshire—called the "Granit state"—
Sent Whipple, Bartlett, Thornton—great
Alike in counsel and debate.

Rhode Island's delegates, we see,
Were Stephen Hopkins and Ellery.

Connecticut, excelled by none,
Sent Roger Sherman, her noblest son,
With Wolcott, Williams, and Huntingdon.

New York as delegates employed
Lewis Morris and William Floyd,
With Francis Lewis and Livingston,
Who died before the war was done.

New Jersey to the Congress sent
Her honored college president,
John Witherspoon, with Stockton, Clark,
Hart, Hopkinson—all men of mark.

Though Pennsylvania need not blush
For Morris, Morton, Wilson, Rush;
And though most men might seem as dross
To Clymer, Taylor, Smith, and Ross,
To Franklin each his tribute brings,
Who neither lightnings feared nor kings.

The men from Delaware—indeed
As true as steel in utmost need—
Were Rodney, with McKean and Read.

"My Maryland" is proud to own
Her Carroll, Paca, Chase, and Stone.

On old Virginia's roll we see
The gifted Richard Henry Lee;
And, just as earnest to be free,
His brother, Francis Lightfoot Lee;
And Whyte and Nelson, patriots true,
With Harrison and Braxton, too;
But of them all there was not one
As great as Thomas Jefferson.

North Carolina's chosen men
We know were Hooper, Hewes, and Penn.

Declaration of Independence.

[Some of our readers may remember an excellent suggestion of Mr. Jason Waters, about a year or so ago, in relation to celebrating our national independence by interchange of gifts and congratulations, similar to the observance of Christmas. The Fourth of July holiday is to us superior to any other day in the calendar. To observe it by remembering our friends, the sick, the suffering, the poor, the unfortunate of all classes as well, is a most beautiful and noble way of keeping the best day of all the year. That we may recall some of the struggles and abuses that made the free government under which we liv possible, we print to-day the form of the Declaration of American Independence, with its signers, that all the children may read and remember.—ED. C. C.]

IN CONGRESS, July 4, 1776.

By the Representativs of the United States, in Congress assembled, a declaration:

WHEN, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which hav connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect for the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident:—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of goverament becomes destructiv of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselvs by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them to absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former system of government. The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world:

He has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature—a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislativ bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved representativ houses repeatedly, for opposing, with manly firmness, his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused, for a long time after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the legislativ powers, incapable of annihilation, hav returned to the people at large for their exercise; the state remaining, in the meantime, exposed to all the danger of invasion from without and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

He has obstructed the administration of justice, by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers. He has made judges dependent on his will alone for the tenure of their offices and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers, to harass our people and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation.

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us;

For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murder which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states;

For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world;

For imposing taxes on us without our consent;

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury;

For transporting us beyond seas, to be tried for pretended offenses;

For abolishing the free system of English law in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies;

For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the forms of our government;

For suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselvs invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated government here by declaring us out of his protection, and waging war against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burned our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries, to complete the works of death, desolation, and tyranny, already begun, with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow-citizens taken captiv on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselvs by their hands.

He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

In every stage of these oppressions we hav petitioned for redress in the most humble terms; our petitions hav been answered only by repeated injury. A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Nor hav we been wanting in attention to our British brethren. We hav warned them, from time to time, of attempts made by their legislatur: to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We hav reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We hav appealed to their nativ justice and magnanimity, and we hav conjured them, by the ties of our common kindred, to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They, too, hav been deaf to the voice of justice and consanguinity. We must therefore acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace, friends.

We, therefore, the representativs of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, appealing to the supreme judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, Free and Independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as Free and Independent States, they hav full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do.

And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

Signed by order and in behalf of the Congress.

DURING COLD WEATHER.—To his fond father, who has asked him where he is in his class now: "Oh, pa, I've got a much better place than I had last quarter." "Indeed. Well, where are you?" "I'm fourteenth." "Fourteenth, you little lazybones! You were eighth last term. Do you call that a better place?" "Yes, it's nearer the stove."—New Moon.

LOOKING OUT FOR NUMBER ONE.—Bobby (whose uncle has given him a dollar): "I wish you would giv me a nickel, Uncle James, instead of a dollar."

Uncle James (astonished): "But, Bobby, a dollar is better than a nickel!"

Bobby: "That's the trouble; if it's a dollar pa'll want it; if it's only a nickel I can hav it."

Religious Problems.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by Nos. 7, 8, 9, and 10 of "Spanish Simplified" are out. Price, 10 cents each. Sold here.

New editions of Bell's "Outline of the French Revolution" and Büchner's "Materialism" are now ready. The first is 25 cents; the second, 15 cents. These are well-known works, and hav had a wide circulation, which should be increased.

Dr. Foote's Health Monthly, $1 annually, is one of the cheapest and best hygienic publications in the country. In the June number is begun a series of papers by Mrs. E. C. Farwell, a TRUTH SEEKER contributor, on the physical training of children.

The Haddam Investigator, Haddam, Kan., is a new local paper, whose editor is a Freethinker, and takes for his motto, "Freethought, Free Speech, and Independent Action." Price, $1. Kansas people in that vicinity will find it entertaining.

James W. Stillman's essay on "Protection, or Tariff for Revenue," has been pamphleted by the author, and sells for 15 cents. As it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, our readers know what it is, and those desiring the argument in permanent form can obtain it at this office.

The article on "Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ," which appeared recently in these columns, makes a pamphlet of sixteen pages, which sells for 3 cents singly, and 30 cents per dozen. Its purpose, for which it is splendidly fitted, is missionary. Send for a dozen or two and scatter them among your Christian neighbors.

Now that Clark Braden is making himself so disgracefully conspicuous on the Pacific coast, lecturers and others who encounter the animal will desire some data regarding it. "The Kind of a Man Clark Braden Is," by B. F. Underwood, partially reveals his mephitic history, and a new edition has been printed. Price, 10 cents.

"The Geological Tourist in Europe" is the title of an article, by Alfred C. Lane, in the June Popular Science Monthly. It has the purpose of indicating briefly to the geologist about to visit Europe what formations and museums are to be found in each locality, and what books and maps the tourist will find serviceable in his geological studies. Price, 50 cents. Sold here.

Will Hubbard Kernan & Sylvester Wilson are publishing a Free Lance in St. Louis, Mo. Mr. Kernan is the editor, and the paper bristles with short lines and alarming statements. Mr. Kernan impales religion, law, and precedent on the point of his lance, and writes bitterly against the shams and hypocrisy of society. How long the Free Lance will exist we hav no means of guessing, but while it does liv it is $2 per year.

"An Essay on Immortality," by Mary S. and James Vincent, Sr., is a ninety-four page pamphlet selling for 50 cents. Mary S. Vincent writes from the spirit world, while James is still in the flesh. Mary S. did her part of the work by impressing her thoughts upon James, who acted as amanuensis. The book purports to be an answer to the unsolved conundrum, "If a man die, shall he liv again?"—of course, in the affirmativ.

Fowler & Wells Company, No. 775 Broadway, New York, has just published an elaborate Chart of Comparativ Phonography, compiled and arranged for the use of students, teachers, and writers of phonography, by Alfred Andrews. It shows the vowel scales, the consonant stems, and the condensations of about a dozen systems of phonography; so that the agreements and differences can be seen and compared. Price, 25 cents.

"Woman: Her Power and Privileges," is the alliterativ title of a series of sermons by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, which Ogilvie & Co., 57 Rose street, this city, hav put into a twenty-five-cent pamphlet and projected upon an unsuspicious public. Mr. Talmage thinks a woman should stay in the house, wash dishes, raise babies, and depend for her influence in the world upon wheedling husbands, fathers, and brothers into doing her will. Mr. Talmage is behind the times. Besides, if the women go into the wheedling and soft-arms-around-the-neck business, they will be infinitly more dangerous than when, spectacled and booted, they stand up squarely and tell Man that he is not of much account anyway, and must stand aside and let her run the universe awhile. The old-fogy notions of such fellows as Talmage are degrading to women, and should not be generally adopted. Woman is an individual, has her individual rights, and is not a coaxing appendage to some "lord and master."

"God In the State," by E. A. Stevens, secretary of the American Secular Union, is a very valuable document showing the dangerous practical alliance now existing between the church and our government. The pamphlet is crowded with facts sufficient to open the eyes of those blind with indifferentism, and arouse them, if not to action, at least to a sense of insecurity. The pamphlet should be circulated by thousands. Published by Putnam & Macdonald, 504 Kearny street, San Francisco, Cal. Price, 10 cents.

We do not know the author of "A Supposed Colloquy between the Pope of Osceola and That Person designated by him Heathen High Priest," but we feel grateful to him for appending to his sharp pamphlet the truthful statement that "any book, religious, Liberal, or scientific, can be obtained at 28 Lafayette place, New York." The Colloquy is a very spicy conversation canvassing the doings and commands of the Lord God Jehovah as found in the Old Testament. Price, 10 cents.

W. D. Hibbard, LL.D., who has mastered not only the three, but an additional R, has written and printed the "Rays of Reason, or Religion Refuted," a two-hundred-and-forty-page cloth-bound book, "containing facts and argument tending to prove the fallacy of a belief in religion and the Bible, yet favoring a belief in the existence of a God or ruling power." It is a first-rate book for argumentativ Infidels (and what Infidel does not like to argue?) to read, and they will be apt to forget Mr. Hibbard's Theism in his ferocious attacks upon the churches, ministers, and Christian theology. The price of the book is not given, but $1 sent to W. D. Hibbard, Keokuk, Ia., ought to get a copy.

The "Science of Society," by Stephen Pearl Andrews, has been reprinted by Liberty and published by Sarah Holmes. All who hav ever heard of this work by Mr. Andrews will thank Mr. Tucker and Mrs. Holmes for giving them the opportunity of obtaining it. Students of sociology should study it, for therein lies some of the truest and deepest philosophy of the century, that will help along toward that ideal time when injustice of government will be replaced by the admitted natural equality of every man, woman, and child, and consequent downfall of monopoly and tyranny. The price of the book is $1, and it is sold at this office.

L. Chute, of Chillicothe, Mo., has bought and read Saladin's "God and His Book," and writes thereof: "Books came to hand in due time and in good order. And we must say that 'God and His Book' is immense. Saladin is a brick, and a man after our own heart; and any mortal endowed with a reasonable amount of mirthfulness, like myself, would hav to smile audibly, and nearly giv up the ghost with merriment, at his expressions, such as, 'Your book, O Lord,' etc. But, great scott! how he does whittle up God—the Jew God Yahwah—show up the old spook-book, and cap-swissel the priesthood! What a splendid weapon it is to down the sky-pilot with! Hence every Liberal should send and secure a copy of the Truth Seeker Company at once—price, $1.50."

"The Anointed Seraph," by G. H. Pollock, Washington, D. C., price $1, is another ludicrous compound of metaphysics and Christian theology. A suitable method by which to write a preface to this volume, says the author, "would be to construct a triangle, inclosing a monogram composed of the letters I, E, R—I for involution, E for evolution, R for redemption; involution to be represented by the line from north to south, evolution from south to east, redemption by a bridge leading up from east to the north point of departure." It is to be regretted that this preface is not found in the book, as it would be its most valuable feature; but compensation is partly made by another incomprehensible diagram, which, however, is incomplete in consequence of the imperfect status of wood-engraving. "In the center should be inserted picture of a maiden countenance, which givs expression to all human qualities, carried up to a divine condition; such cannot be executed on a wood-cut illustration." While not prepared to dispute this proposition concerning a maiden countenance, we can only lament the unskilfulness of Washington artists who fail to giv expression to the author's ideal. If Mr. Pollock will call on Mr. Moss, who makes the portraits for our ANNUALS, he can get a picture of a maiden countenance of any degree of beauty and soulfulness, from Psyche to Mrs. Cleveland.

"Christianity and Progress" is the title of a small pamphlet by G. W. Foote, editor of the London Freethinker, in reply to W. E. Gladstone's criticism of Mrs. Humphrey Ward's "Robert Elsmere," a book which has made no little stir in England, being a novel describing the processes of growth of an honest clergyman's mind from Christianity to Agnosticism. Mr. Foote, however, concerns himself more with Mr. Gladstone's utterances on Christianity than with his consideration of the novel. Mr. Foote always writes interestingly and convincingly, backs himself up with facts and quotations, and generally makes out his case—as he has most assuredly done in this pamphlet, which can be obtained of the Progressiv Publishing Co., 28 Stonecutter st., E.C., London, England, for 10 cents.

Three parts of "Moral Science Deduced from the Bible," constituting a true theology, hav been handed us by the author, Mr. Jerome B. Holgate, of Utica, N. Y. Mr. Holgate's plan is to found institutions beneficial to the people, to carry the beautiful into life, reduce taxation, establish schools for moral culture, found rural villas where comfortable homes and the means of subsistence can be obtained at the lowest rates, reconcile capital and labor, and do other humanitarian works. He claims that his true theology harmonizes revelation, reason, science, the evolutions of history, and furnishes a basis for a common faith. He interprets the Bible differently from ordinary theologians, and in a way which satisfies himself. The price of his book is 50 cents each part. Mr. Holgate's motivs seem to be of the best.

"Ancient Opinions upon Psychic Bodies, and The Popular Idea of Soul-Survival," is another broad-paged collection of the jargon of Theosophy. This quotation is a sample of its style: "'There can be nothing more monstrous,' says Dr. Henry More, 'than to make two souls in man, the one sensitiv, the other rational, really distinct from one another, and to giv the name of Astral Spirit to the former; when there is in man no astral spirit save the plastic of the soul itself, which is always inseparable from the rational. Nor upon any other account can it be called astral, but as it is liable to that corporeal temperament which proceeds from the stars, or rather from any material causes in general, as not being yet sufficiently united with the divine body—that vehicle of divine virtue or power.' So he maintains that the Kabalistic three souls—Nephesh, Ruach, Neshamah—originate in a misunderstanding of the true Platonic doctrin, which is that of a threefold 'vital congruity.'"

"Everyone has heard of the butcher who, after a long search for his knife, at last found it in his mouth; so speakers of English hav been seeking for a universal language, when lo! it is in their mouths. The intelligibility of English words has been obscured by a dense mist of letters. This is now dispersed by A. Melville Bell, who has already won a world-wide reputation through his invention of 'Visible Speech,' the great boon to deaf-mutes. Professor Bell calls this new discovery of his 'World-English,' and the result is a language which cannot fail to meet with acceptance, and at once supersede the supposed necessity for 'Volapük,' or any other artificial language. No language could be invented for international use that would surpass English in grammatical simplicity, and in general fitness to become the tongue of the world. It is already the mother-tongue of increasing millions in both hemispheres, and some knowledge of the language is demanded by all educated populations on the globe. Social and commercial necessities require that the acquisition of this knowledge shall be facilitated, and it is believed that Professor Bell's invention has removed the last impediment to English becoming the universal language, for which vague desires hav long been entertained, although hitherto only futil efforts hav been made. 'World-English' is published in pamphlet form by N. D. C. Hodges, 47 Lafayette place, New York. Price 25 cents." The foregoing is quoted from a circular sent with the pamphlet which it advertises, and is the rosy view of the work of Mr. Hodges. People interested should get the book and see how near the truth an advertising circular can get.

The American Idea says of Colonel Kelso's "Universe Analyzed:"

Mr. Kelso is gifted with those rare analytical powers that render the subtlest philosophical conceptions the easy property of the most ordinary mind. He passes the universe before the eye of the reader in all the wonderful processes of evolution like one vast, unending, thrilling panorama, making it at once a work as easy as a juvenil story-book, as interesting as "David Copperfield," and as profound as Newton's "Principia."

The work contains many sublime ideas and grand conceptions that will be new to the world and productiv of a vast amount of good in furnishing food for thought. Although I cannot accept his position in regard to the idea of time, I am compelled to say that he fortifies the most of his new ideas with arguments that are lucid, logical, and absolutely unanswerable. The severest criticism I would make is the injustice which the judge does to himself by giving the credit of the work to "spirit intelligences" that hav "inspirationally" aided him in its preparation.

We trust that the work will hav the immense distribution it so richly merits.

The Open Court Publishing Co., of Chicago, send us "F. Max Müller on the Science of Thought." Professor Müller's idea, as he tells us in the preface, is that reason and language are fundamentally identical, and that the "growth of reason" is really the growth of thought. He says:

Because we reason, that is, because we reckon, because we add and subtract, therefore we say that we hav reason, and thus it happened that reason was raised into something which we hav or possess, into a faculty, or power, or something, whatever it may be, that deserves to be written with a capital R. And yet we hav only to look into the workshop of language in order to see that there is nothing substantial corresponding to this substantiv, and that neither the heart nor the brain, neither the breath nor the spirit of man, discloses its original whereabouts. It may sound violent and revolutionary to you when I say that there is no such thing as reason, and yet no philosopher, not even Kant, has ever in his definition of reason told us what it is really made of.

The price of the book is 75 cents, and as a source of new and perhaps startling ideas, it is worth a careful study.

E. C. Walker's Fair Play, a new Anarchistic journal, is bright, readable, and argumentativ, and well printed. Mr. Walker says that his paper "enters the field of radical journalism at this time because its publishers believe that hard work can make room for it, not because they suppose that the millions are consciously in need of papers of this class, for, if they were, they would establish them upon a surely stable financial basis. But when papers are so established they generally represent only the dollars of their founders, not the best thought and moral purpose of the times. Journals which 'fill a long-felt want' are usually so far in the rear upon all questions of living interest that the impression of the types upon the white paper is a waste of mechanical force. The paper remains blank." It pains us to note that Fair Play and the Investigator are already at loggerheads, but we hope the trouble will soon be over. Fair Play is philanthropically published weekly at 75 cents per year, a price somewhat below the cost of manufacture, at Valley Falls, Kan. Fair Play and Lucifer, Mr. Walker's father-in-law's paper, are sent to one subscriber for $1.60.

"Forty Years on the Spiritual Rostrum," by Warren Chase, has been published by Colby & Rich, of Boston. The work is "a sequel to 'The Life-Line of the Lone One,' an autobiography of the author, as The World's Child." In their advertisment of the book, Messrs. Colby & Rich say: "No one is better qualified to place on record reliable information regarding the early history of Modern Spiritualism, and of its early advocates and defenders, than the author of this volume. There has been scarcely a worker for the cause he has not known; scarce a city or town in the Union he has not visited; and no place he has visited whose people hav not enjoyed greater mental freedom and a better understanding of this life and assurance of a future one from his having been with them. As a worker in every reformatory movement, Mr. Chase's career has been almost phenomenal in persistency, efficiency, and self-sacrifice. He has been a pioneer—a pathfinder in the wilderness of moss-grown superstitions and hide-bound dogmas, making the way clear for the army of freedom-loving men and women that was to follow and destroy it For this reason this autobiography of his should find place in the home of every friend of human progress and spiritual enlightenment, and be valued as a monument to his memory and his work." The book is lively and full of interesting reminiscences, and friends of Mr. Chase and older Spiritualists will certainly desire to possess it. Price $1, if purchased here; $1.10 if bought in Boston.

George Weir, who keeps a "Freethought Depot" at 5 Greenside Place, Leith Walk, nearly opposit the Theater Royal, Edinburgh, Scotland, writes: "I always look forward with pleasure to the arrival of your capital paper, which is, at present, my beau ideal of what an educational and aggressiv Freethought and Secular paper should be. It is superior to Artemus Ward's wax 'figgers' in being not even 'ekalled' by any of its rivals, and it is certainly 'ekselled' by none. Long may it prosper in its heroic attempts to strangle the hideous theological viper which has so long lived on the life-blood of the people. I observe that persecution is still smoldering in the New World, like a dying volcano in its last throes bursting out now and again and doing some damage in its frantic efforts to avert the extinguishment it so richly deserves and which is slowly, though surely, approaching. In the old country here we are like chickens quaking under the hawk eye of very stringent blasphemy laws, which may swoop down on their devoted prey at any time, but the situation is being gradually reversed by the strong and rapid growth of the one and the superannuation of the other. The last real attempt to interfere with us was made two years ago, when Mr. Fergusson, of the Glasgow Freethought Depot, a hale old man of seventy-seven, was sentenced to a month's imprisonment for selling the Freethinker, but on appealing to the supreme court the decision was immediately quashed. I hav been twice apprehended for lecturing here at the very spot where the Young Men's Christian Association hold their meetings, but as they did not venture to prosecute, the affair only gave me a gratuitous advertisment, and I hold forth every Sunday at the same place in spite of all their attempts to dislodge me. I hav always a good audience, and am cheered on in the work by making a good many converts and selling a quantity of literature. The Young Men's Christian Association hav not claimed their position for about two months, so I am afraid my blasphemy has evicted them. I inclose the first three of a series of tracts I intend to issue. You will see that the first one is taken from THE TRUTH SEEKER." The leaflets mentioned by Mr. Weir are "Some Objections to Christianity," from THE TRUTH SEEKER, "Freethought Gleanings," and "Tid-Bits from Colonel Ingersoll." Mr. Weir also asks us to bring to the attention of any Scotchman who may read THE TRUTH SEEKER the following:

With the view of extending and organizing the Freethought party in Scotland, by means of lectures to be delivered at various places, Mr. C. F. Jamieson, of Glasgow, formerly a Baptist minister, has agreed to place his services at our disposal for a period of three months.

We consider that Secularism would thereby be greatly advanced, and now appeal to all interested in the movement to assist pecuniarily in making it a success. We earnestly hope that ample aid will be furnished, and cannot believe that in so good a cause it will be withheld.

You will greatly oblige by bringing this under the notice of any friends to the cause in your district.

Subscriptions may be sent to the financial secretary, Charles Nicholson, Roxburgh Hall, Drummond street; or to George Weir, Freethought Depot, 5 Greenside place, Edinburgh.

M. Weir is an earnest and enthusiastic worker for mental freedom, and he and his fellow-laborers in Scotland ought to be helped.

Calcutta, India, is to hav a Freethought journal called Reason. Tulsidas Mookerjea, of 19 Roy Bagan street, Simla P. O., Calcutta, is the editor. Mr. Mookerjea desires aid in its conduct, as may be seen from the following letter to us:

Dear Sir: The rapid spread of the mischievous teachings of the Bible in this country is a serious calamity. Many hundreds of Christian missionaries, supported by the government and rich private bodies, are coming out here, year after year, and pursuing the work of proselytism with good success. There are a few societies, also, which offer inducements to our youths in the shape of young, handsome European wives, and lucrativ and honorable posts under the government, over which they hav great influence, etc. Many hav been led astray at the prospect of these delusiv hopes. Innocent school-boys are snatched away from their parents and made to swallow the pills of Christian theology. They hav also succeeded, to a great extent, in infusing into their minds a spirit of revolt and insubordination toward those to whom respect, honor, and obedience are due.

To arrest the growth of this growing evil, and to enlighten the younger portion of our community, especially the student class, on many points of European, American, and Sanscrit philosophy, science, and culture, possessed of a little smattering of which the Christian priests surprise them and earn their respect for and faith in the abominable creed, we hav made up our mind to start a monthly English journal, to be named Reason, in July next.

Our main object is to demolish Christianity and to set up "reason" in its place as the safest guide in all our intercourse in life.

The writer of this letter had the good fortune, as a writer in the Anti-Christian (which is defunct now), to peruse your writings, and remembers very well the magic power which they command for their intrinsic merits of cogent logic and originality. On the destructiv side of Christianity, a single contribution once or twice a month, from the pen of a veteran leader of thought like yourself, is sure to deal a fatal blow to the accursed creed to the demolition of which you hav (and are still doing so) spent your whole energies.

We do not know the names and addresses of all the Anti-Christian writers besides yourself, and similar societies, of whose cooperation and literary help we are in urgent need. Will you kindly let us know their names and addresses, and inform them of our humble request for literary help in this matter?

In conclusion, we beg to assure you of our hearty but humble coöperation in the noble work you are carrying on there. Further, we beg of you to favor us with a copy of your valuable works at your earliest convenience. We humbly request you to contribute to our journal as often as will suit your leisure. Meanwhile, we hope that you will kindly send us an article or two to grace the very first issue of our monthly in July next.

Finally, we beg your permission to insert, now and then, your writings in our journal, which we will send you regularly. We hope that you will, with your usual kindness, grant our request.

We hav given our oriental friend the desired permission, heartily appreciating the good opinion he has of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and suggest that our Liberal writers forward him contributions, putting five cents an ounce postage on their letters.

Odds and Ends.

A PHILADELPHIAN who had reached the age of 112 years and had smoked a pipe for 97 years, suddenly changed to cigarets. In ten months he was dead.

SHE (at a revival): "Is it possible that the little fellow sitting on the platform is the boy preacher?" He: "Oh, no; he is the boy preacher's little grandson."

A CHEMIST declares that wood can be converted into palatable food. Those persons who pay $20 a week for "board" at the summer resorts will not be surprised at the statement.

"No," said Mr. Isaacstein, "dem pents don't fit you. Dey vos bretty dight in der seams. But I dell you vot, my frent, at tree dollars 'n' a helf, dem pents eas vort drainin' down to."

A YOUNG man who tried to sing bass,
Made such a horrible fass,
That the rest of the choir
Arose in its oir,
And fired him out of the plass.

FASHIONABLE daughter: "Mamma, do you really think it is wrong for me to flirt in a mild sort of way?" Fashionable mother (terrified): "Clara, I am surprised at you. The idea of an unmarried person flirting!"

FIRST little boy: "My pop says officeholders is the servants of the people." Second little boy: "My pop says the officeholders do just what they please and charge like sixty for it." Little girl: "I dess that's why they'se called servants."

KIND old lady: "Little boy, wouldn't you like to go to Sabbath-school, and learn to be good?" Little boy: "No'm, it would ruin me repertashun." Kind old lady: "Ruin your reputation?" Little boy: "Yes'm, I'm known as 'the bad boy of the block.'"

MR. ARNOLD left only £1,040 behind him. If he had spent part of the time he passed in disliking this country in acquainting himself with the methods of the Standard Oil Company and the grape-sugar manufacturers, he might hav learned to make sweetness and light pan out richer.

AN exchange tells of a school-ma'am who has introduced a novel system of spelling in her school. When one of the girls misses a word the boy who spells it correctly is permitted to kiss the girl. The boys are improving rapidly, but it is feared that under the arrangement the girls will soon forget how to spell their own names.

TRAMP (to editor, who is hurrying past): "Say, couldn't you help me a little, please? I gave you a boost once." Editor: "What do you mean, fellow?" Tramp: "Don't you remember that burglary by Jim Crackitt and his pals some years ago?" Editor: "Yes." Tramp: "And how your reports of it just set the Howler's circulation a-boomin'?" Editor: "Yes." Tramp: "Well, I'm Jim!"

HE dropped on his knees at her feet and began the speech he had been so long rehearsing. "Darling love, I hate you—I—mean, darling, hate, I love you, no—no—I mean——" Here his face assumed a livid hue and began to tie itself in hard knots. "What is it—paralysis?" she asked, frantically. "No, love," he whispered, hoarsely, "I am kneeling on a tack."

"SIR," said the austere-looking man in black to the visitor in St. Louis, "your convention here, as well as the one at Chicago, was bound hand and foot in the chains of the rum power." "I'm afraid, friend, that you're sadly off," replied the other; "you don't know our boys. It would hav gone hard with anyone who had tried to force rum on them. Champagne was the booze."

WHEN Eve brought woe to all mankind,
Old Adam called her woe-man;
But when she wooed with love so kind,
He then pronounced her woo-man.

But now, with folly and with pride,
Their husbands' pockets trimming,
The ladies are so full of whims,
That people call them whim-men.

MODERN Bostonian (who has only been over about six months, to his friend, the alderman): "Good marnin', Misther O'Toole. Could yez hav the koindness to tell me phwy the shops do be closed and the flags a-flyin'?" Mr. O'Toole: "It do be the siventeenth, Dennis." Modern Bostonian: "The siventeenth, is it? Saints aloive, do yez hav two Saint Pathrick's days to the year in Ameriky?"

"FAIN would I write a poem on the delights of fishing, but, ah, me! I cannot find a word to rhyme with 'angleworm,'" sighed Pisistratus, as he gazed thoughtfully into the dark, sullen waters. "But why must you put that word at the end of a line?" queried Eucalyptus. "Because an angleworm is always at the end of a line," hissed Pisistratus between his set teeth, and for a long time it was so still that one could distinctly hear a peach blow.

A FEMALE Mark Tapley after a life of toil found herself an inmate of an almshouse. Reviewing her trials she said her husband had abused her, often beat her, but the Lord was good and took him away. When her son grew up he also was unkind and abusiv, but the Lord was still merciful and carried him off with an attack of pneumonia. She had much to be thankful for in her old age. She had two teeth left, and thanked the Lord they were opposit each other.

"YES, dear, I hav recorded our marriage license," said the Chicago youth, displaying the document to his heart's delight; "and now we can get married as soon as you will say the word." "But, George," exclaimed the young lady in consternation, "are you sure this is right? Isn't there something lacking?" "Something lacking? I don't think I follow you, dearest." "I suppose I'm a silly little fool, George, but don't call me an ignoramus now, will you? But I always supposed that a marriage license had a divorce coupon attached."

Gems of Thought.

WE are not endeavoring to chain the future, but to free the present. We are not forging fetters for our children, but we are breaking those our fathers made for us. We are the advocates of inquiry, of investigation, and thought This of itself is an admission that we are not perfectly satisfied with all our conclusions—philosophy has not the egotism of faith. While superstition builds walls and creates obstructions, science opens all the highways of thought.—Ingersoll.

THE messiah of antinaturalism sanctioned the use of alcoholic drinks by his personal example—nay, by the association of that practice with the rites of a religious sacrament. The habit of purchasing mental exaltation—even to a fever-dream—at the expense of the body, agreed perfectly with the tendencies of a nature-despising fanaticism, and during the long night of the Middle Ages monks and priests vied in an unprecedented excess of alcoholic riots. Nearly every one of the thick-sown convents from Greece to Portugal had a vineyard and a wine-cellar of its own. The monastery of Weltenburg, on the upper Danube, operated the largest brewery of the German empire. —Felix L. Oswald's Bible of Nature.

IT is a very justifiable cause of a war, to invade a country after the people hav been wasted by famin, destroyed by pestilence, or embroiled by factions among themselvs. It is justifiable to enter into war against our nearest ally, when one of his towns lies convenient for us, or a territory of land that would render our dominions round and compact. If a prince sends forces into a nation where the people are poor and ignorant, he may lawfully put half of them to death, and make slaves of the rest, in order to civilize and reduce them from their barbarous way of living. It is a very kingly, honorable, and frequent practice, when one prince desires the assistance of another to secure him against an invasion, that the assistant, when he has driven out the invader, should seize on the dominions himself, and kill, imprison, or banish the prince he came to relieve. Alliance by blood or marriage is a frequent cause of war between princes, and the nearer the kindred is the greater is their disposition to quarrel. Poor nations are hungry, and rich nations are proud; and pride and hunger will ever be at variance. For these reasons, the trade of a soldier is held the most honorable of all others, because a soldier is a Yahoo hired to kill, in cold blood, as many of his own species who hav never offended him, as possibly he can.—Swift.

YET I love glory—glory's a great thing—
Think what it is to be in your old age
Maintained at the expense of your good king;
A moderate pension shakes full many a sage,
And heroes are but made for bards to sing,
Which is still better; thus in verse to wage
Yours wars eternally, besides enjoying
Half-pay for life, make mankind worth destroying. —Byron.

SAR. Oh, thou wouldst hav me doubtless set up edicts—
"Obey the king—contribute to his treasure—
Recruit his phalanx—spill your blood at bidding—
Fall down and worship, or get up and toil."
Or thus: "Sardanapalus on this spot
Slew fifty thousand of his enemies.
These are their sepulchers, and this his trophy."
I leave such things to conquerors; enough
For me, if I can make my subjects feel
The weight of human misery less, and glide
Ungroaning to the tomb, I take no license
Which I deny to them. We all are men. —Ibid.

VOLTAIRE.

THE most extraordinary of Frenchmen, and one of the most extraordinary of human beings.—James Parton.

IN the presence of this society, frivolous and dismal, Voltaire alone, having before his eyes those united forces, the court, the nobility, capital; that unconscious power, the blind multitude; that terrible magistracy, so severe to subjects, so docil to the master, crushing and flattering, kneeling upon the people before the king; that clergy, vile melange of hypocrisy and fanaticism; Voltaire alone, I repeat it, declared war against that coalition of all the social iniquities, against that enormous and terrible world, and he accepted battle with it. And what was his weapon? That which has the lightness of the wind and the power of the thunder-bolt. A pen. . . . Voltaire waged the splendid kind of warfare, the war of one alone against all; that is to say, the grand warfare. The war of thought against matter, the war of reason against prejudice, the war of the just against the unjust, the war for the oppressed against the oppressor, the war of goodness, the war of kindness. He had the tenderness of a woman and the wrath of a hero. He was a great mind, and an immense heart.—Hugo.

FISHING.

"And he saith unto them, Follow me and I will make you fishers of men. . . . And he said unto Simon, Fear not: from henceforth thou shalt catch men."—Ancient Writ.

The Devil sat by the river's side—
The stream of time, where you'll always find him—
Casting his line in the rushing tide,
And landing the fish on the bank behind him.

He sat at ease in a cosy nook,
And was flinging his basket very fast;
While you might have seen that his deadly hook
Was differently baited for every cast.

He caught 'em as fast as a man could count,
Little or big, it was all the same;
One bait was a check for a round amount—
An assemblyman nabbed it, and out he came.

He took a gem that as Saturn shone;
It sank in the water without a sound,
And caught a woman who long was known
As the best and purest for miles around.

Sometimes he would laugh and sometimes sing,
For better luck no one could wish;
And he seemed to know, to a dead-sure thing,
The bait best suited to every fish.

Quoth Satan: "The fishing is rare and fine!"
And he took a drink—somewhat enthused;
And yet a parson swam round the line
That even the most tempting of baits refused.

He tried with his gold and his flashing gems,
Hung fame and fortune upon the line,
Dressing-gowns with embroidered hems,
But still the dominie made no sign.

A woman's garter went on the hook;
"I have him at last," quoth the Devil, brightning;
Then Satan's side with laughter shook,
And he landed the parson as quick as lightning.

Notes and Clippings.

THE emperor of China has donated $42 000 to the archbishop of Pekin for a new cathedral.

EDITORIAL in the Herald of the 27th ult: "Mr. Marsh said yesterday that he still believes those pictures to hav been painted by the spirits. It is a case of You don't and He does, but he has just as good a right to his opinion as you hav to yours. The flag of the free and the home of the brave."

THIS is a political note from Indianapolis, Ind., the home of the Republican candidate for president: "There isn't a man in Indiana more delighted over Harrison's nomination than his red-whiskered pastor, Rev. Dr. M. L. Haines. If the parson is to be kept out of politics this year he should be bottled at once, for his enthusiasm and interest are growing every hour, and he looks and acts as though he thought, with Col. Elliot F. Shepard, that the hand of providence did the business at Chicago. The pastor is a plain man and livs plainly, and the only thing he will swear by, under or over the earth, is Ben. Harrison. Pastor Haines said numberless good things for Mr. Harrison this afternoon when a reporter called upon him. According to the parson, General Harrison's line of religious work is not exhorting. His part in the meetings is usually the offering of a prayer, and all his supplications are brief, earnest, and well phrased, just like his public speeches and his law documents. He was formerly teacher of the Bible class in the Sunday-school, and had among his pupils the then Postmaster Holloway."

AT the Republican ratification meeting in this city last week Colonel Ingersoll was the orator of the evening. When the president of the meeting arose to make a few remarks, he said: "The Bible tells us that——" As the audience caught sight of Ingersoll's laughing face it roared with merriment. "The Bible tells us——" Colonel Ingersoll nearly fell off his seat as a convulsion of humor seized him, and the speaker was drowned in the ocean of laughter that swept over the wide auditorium. "Giv us facts!" cried some one, and now New Yorkers are wondering what the Bible really does tell us. In beginning his speech Colonel Ingersoll vindicated his right to make the Chicago speech which has been so ignorantly condemned by the press of both parties. He said: "A speaker who is perfectly cool and candid, who tells his honest thoughts, not only honors himself, but compliments his audience. It is only to the candid that a man can afford to open his heart. Most people when a man is nominated for the presidency claim that they were first for him. As a rule it is because they are so anxious to be with the procession, or afraid of being left, that they insist that they got exactly the man they wanted. I will be frank enough to say to you that the convention did not nominate the man of my choice. But there is something in the American blood that bows to the will of the majority. That is the splendid fealty and loyalty to the great principle upon which our government rests, so that when the convention reached its conclusion every true Republican was for the nomination. There were good men from whom to select this ticket. I was for one; and some people think, or say they think, that I made a mistake in telling the name of the man that I was for. But I always know whom I am for; I always know what I am for, and I know the reasons why I am for a thing or a man. It never once occurred to me that the way to get a man nominated was to keep his name secret. When I am for a man, I like to stand by him, even while others leave. No matter if at last I stand alone. I believe in doing things openly and in the light of day, in the wide air. No snake ever had a skin brilliant enough; no snake ever crawled through the grass secretly enough, or silently enough, or carefully enough to excite my admiration. My admiration is for the eagle, the monarch of the empyrean, who, with outstretched pinions, soars and challenges the gaze of the world. Take your position in the sunlight. Tell your neighbors and friends what you may think, and giv your reasons for your position. If that is a mistake, I expect to repeat that mistake, and to liv making mistakes. I do not like the secret way. I was for one man, not because I had anything against the others, noble and splendid men, worthy to be presidents of the United States.' The audience interrupted him with applause' at almost every sentence, and the colonel is the biggest man in town at present.

Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

It has long been believed by paleontologists and scientists that India, or southern Asia, was where human beings were developed and first existed. The infancy of the race was cradled there, and there had its origin the far-famed allegory of the "Garden of Eden," based on the legends and traditions long preserved by the earliest peoples, which has since become the sacred literature of the Christianized world.

The innumerable theories of the cosmos, with the concomitant ideas of the origin of the gods, their self-existent natures, and powers over matter, with their methods and processes of creation, formed the themes for the feeble leaders of thought, for priests and philosophers, long before the art of writing had been developed further than in the use of a few hieroglyphics.

But at this early stage in the history of the species, the germs of many of the beliefs and theories we now entertain had their origin. Nature, as it presented itself to the observing faculties, and to the untrained, limited, reasoning mind, was then, as now, the basis from which their vague theories and doctrines were formed. Logic as a science or system of reasoning was not understood or appreciated. The need for it had not been felt even among their leading thinkers. Objective appearances and coincidences, without critical analysis or discovery of possible natural relationship, were sufficient to establish the conviction of cause and effect.

Among the strange, incoherent theories that had their origin in that feeble and childish age, is one that is cherished as sacred now, that is, the doctrine or dogma of the trinity, known as the "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." It grew out of the confused ideas men entertained of nature and of the gods, or of the dæmons or forces that presided over and directed all natural operations.

They saw in the genesis and succession of all life there was the male, female, and offspring. This they discovered was not confined to the animal, but extended to vegetable life. The existence of life depended on these three factors. Without the father or male principle to fertilize, the female principle to cherish and develop, and the offspring as the product, and all being thus preserved and perpetuated, that life must speedily end. Here, then, is the principle, the practical illustration, of the existence of the trinity in physical nature, and from the observation of these facts, by a very ready deduction, the inference was at once drawn that in the invisible world the creative principle was differentiated into the three corresponding presiding powers expressed in the trinity.

This primitive reasoning and the doctrines established on it are as old as civilization and as universal as man. In some shape and under some name it has dominated all states and countries where men have reasoned and thought sufficiently to form a government and initiate a civilization. In India this trinity was expressed by Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; in Persia by Ormuzd, Vishnu, and Ahiram; in Egypt by Osiris, Isis, and Horus. In Greece it was developed among the learned into a philosophy, and among the ignorant into a mythology.

Christianity, or the simple ethics of Joshua [Jesus] the Rabbi, the prophet, reformer, and martyr of Judea, was taken by its missionaries into these countries; and, so far as the people embraced it as a religion, it was only accepted and admitted in connection with the, to them, divinely established doctrine of the trinity.

Everything that existed was subject to this triune god. Nothing could be believed, nothing taught, that was wise and good, which did not emanate from this source. The Christian converts in all these gentile countries, and the churches that were organized there, were composed of members who embraced the precepts of Joshua in connection with their long-cherished pagan doctrines.

It is well known, and is everywhere corroborated in history, that these ancient churches held on most tenaciously for centuries to the paganism of their countries, the inheritance from their fathers; so that Christianity then was a conglomerate of incoherent, contradictory theories and beliefs.

The Greek and Latin fathers of the church differed widely among themselves, and these differences led to controversies and conflicts of great ferocity. These pagan trinities formed the subject that almost wrecked and ruined Christianity in its infancy. To understand the composition and function of this trinity was the problem.

If Christianity embraced the lessons of a trinity, if it was ushered into the world by a trinity, which trinity should claim its paternity? Was it Ormuzd, Vishnu, and Ahiram, of Persia; or Osiris, Isis, and Horus, of Egypt? Or, as it came from Syria, was it the Chaldean trinity; or was its origin from the one indivisible Jehovah of the Jews? The Christian world was flooded with agony, anguish, and blood in trying to solve this problem, in trying to settle the complicated questions and intricate mysteries that were involved in its solution. The trouble took its most aggravated form and dangerous character early in the fourth century, between Athanasius and Arius and their respective partisans and followers. In the two subsequent centuries it is estimated that one hundred million lives were sacrificed in trying to settle it. So says Dr. Draper.

These continual and destructive wars wearied, worried, and exhausted the combatants into submission or resignation to the dominant, and on that account called the orthodox, party—the barbarian and pagan majority, led to the conflict by ardent, fanatical, ambitious enthusiasts, who fell in line with the low, ignorant, pagan element of society, and overpowered the weaker, the more intelligent and rational minority.

While the Christian trinity is the same, and answered all the purposes that the pagans had for a trinity, yet as a compromise, with a view of bringing together into a degree of harmony the different, dissenting Christian sects, the names of all the heathen trinities were dropped out of the Christian creed, and as a substitute for Ormuzd or Osiris, the Chaldean or Jewish heavenly father was adopted for the first person in the trinity. For the second person the Greek Ghost, or dæmon, stood for Vishnu and Isis. And for the Egyptian Horus the "Son," or "Son of God," was adopted. For a long time the simple "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost" were all that it was necessary to believe in, or to record in the creed. The word "holy" was indispensable as an adjunct to the Ghost, to distinguish it from the multitude of vicious or unholy ghosts that were everywhere haunting and harassing Greek life. This second person in the pagan trinities was always represented as a female. But in the Christian trinity it was found necessary to bestow upon it the male function in order that by its "overshadowing" of the Virgin Mary it might be the father of the "Son," the third person of the trinity. The offices of the Christian trinity are not as simple and natural as are those of the pagan trinities.

Their trinities simply presided over the operations and processes of nature, without leaving their serene abode outside of visible matter; while the second person in the Christian trinity was obliged to come to the earth and personally unite with matter here in the form of a virgin, in order to complete the trinity, and thereby secure the salvation of all Christian sinners who were made so through the fall of Adam.

The Christians would not have had a trinity if the early fathers of the church had not borrowed it or brought it with them from the heathen. Joshua, whom the Greeks for short called Jeshu, and who is known in the modern world as Jesus, did not believe or teach any trinity, and the early converts to the faith made a bad and bungling work in engrafting it into the Christian creed.

If they had been as well skilled in mechanical dialectics and forensic metaphysics as the theologians of this age, they would have made the transfer and executed the delicate task with much more artistic elegance.

Theology, all through the centuries, has been trying to supplement the defects of the original work by adding epithets of laudation and fulsome compliments to each branch of their triune deity.

They exhaust the language in superlatives to glorify the work, which the ancients spoiled from the want of genius and imagination. "Holy father," "gracious," "merciful," "adorable," "patient," "forgiving," and "long-suffering," etc. The Holy Ghost, or the Holy Spirit, has been burdened with the plaudits of his or her many virtues and responsibilities, for the part assigned it in the triple plan of the redemption of sinners and of worrying saints into heaven.

"The blessed Son and sent of God," "holy redeemer and savior" of men, "the immaculate lamb of God," "the holy pattern," "heavenly man and Son of the blessed Virgin," with every conceivable combination of fulsome adjectives, are bestowed on the third person of this trinity, and from what motiv can we conceive, other than the belief that friendship and favors can be secured by such unbounded laudation, and that the costly but blundering work of our patristic ancestors may be glorified? For we must remember that our religious literature, and our holy faith, would have been next to nothing without this august doctrine of paganism.

Is it not very plain that this wicked world could not be saved without it? It is so superhuman and celestial that it has taxed the ingenuity of the theologians to save us, even with it.

This Son of God, over which the Greek fathers contended and fought so long, but finally put into their trinity at the Council of Nice, and the same one we are worshiping to-day, is not a real character, and was not born in Judea in the family of Joseph and Mary. The son of Joseph was named Joshua, and his Jewish disciples all believed and affirmed that he was a natural and legitimate son of his parents. They are the best and only witnesses we have of his pedigree. He was a Rabbi, a prophet, among them, and for three hundred years they and their descendants persistently avowed their conviction of that fact. So Eusebius and other writers of that period assure us.

This Son of God of the Greeks was born of their mythology, and of their determination to frame an acceptable trinity for their pagan converts.

We can readily understand why they fixed his nativity in Judea, a country so far away, and why they represented that he was born over two hundred years prior to the time they had use for a Son of God to make up their new Christian trinity.

It was to put it so far back in time and so far away in distance that their credulous followers found it much easier to blindly take their testimony than it would have been to attempt an investigation to ascertain whether they could find the facts to confirm the faith. Some of the more inquisitive and intelligent did go in search for the authority, but the witnesses and testimony of the Judean disciples, the Ebionites, negatived the whole theory of a Son of God ever being born in any illegitimate or supernatural way among their people. See Eusebius, Eccl. History, chap. Ebionites.

Had not our early pagan ancestors been so acute as to discover the trinity in the material world, their imaginations would not have invented one for the unseen or immaterial world, nor have prepared such a divine or spiritual legacy to transmit to us their posterity. We owe to them our obligations for the inheritance of the basis of that scheme of redemption through which salvation can be obtained. In return for this priceless gift can we do less than send missionaries to convert them to that true faith which they have been the means of ushering into this fallen, wicked world?

Truly we may say, Great and marvelous are thy ways, Lord God almighty, to put within the reach of a rebellious world a knowledge of thy secrets and mysteries, in these wonderful revelations of thy triune nature!

Science, philosophy, and learning could never have discovered this supernatural provision in the divine economy. Is it not true that "he has chosen the weak things of this world to confound the mighty, and the things that are not to bring to naught the things that are?" Though many centuries came and went with these pagans alone in possession of this mystery of the trinity, the time at last arrived when Christendom was to receive it from the hands of that unfortunate portion of the human race we call the lost—the unconverted heathen.

It was through them we first learned we had a "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." It was through them we had the names or terms furnished us on which we could bestow our adjectives of adulation—a privilege from which our Hebrew ancestors were excluded because they had no adjectives in their language.

Everyone who has read Greek literature, or that is at all acquainted with the state of thought or belief at and before the period in which the New Testament was written, can very readily see and account for the "Son of God" that has come down to us from that, day, and as translated into our scriptures. These Sons of God were in a sense mythical characters. Their existence seems to have been really and sincerely believed. They were of doubtful morality. They were above and beyond the restraints of law or the control of public sentiment. They harassed, haunted, and tempted human beings, and were the source of no little perplexity and anxiety in the control they exercised over human nature. There were rigid provisions and rules made to protect society from their malign influences and evil designs. The fact of their being the Sons of God was not any guarantee of their virtue. They were supposed to possess all the various qualities of men, or rather of imparting to human beings all the physical, moral, and other endowments that distinguished and elevated them above, or that sunk them below, the brutes.

Women were particularly the objects of their attention and victims of their power. It was through their intimacy with them that the earth was peopled with a dangerous and troublesome species of monsters or hybrids that demoralized and endangered public welfare. The early scripture writers refer to these views of the ancients when they say, "And the Sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair."

To prevent their visits, their attentions and amours, and to protect society from the resulting evils, it was made a usage and a law that all women should wear their hair long, that it fall over faces and busts, to shield them from the gaze of these Sons of God; and in the orient and even here the practice of veiling the face still continues. This was originally done for the same purpose.

When Paul wrote his epistles this belief still existed, and he insisted that it was right for the women to adhere to the practice, giving the reasons that had long been prevalent—to evidence their modesty. Our Christian women are now taught and expected to adhere to this old pagan habit, but for a different reason. Their hair is worn now for an ornament, to add to their charms and attractions rather than to conceal them. How time has metamorphosed ideas and motives! T. E. LONGSHORE.

(TO BE CONCLUDED.)

In the Beginning—Did God Make?

Among the many time-honored saws and apothegms which hav come down to us from the remotest antiquity, few indeed will bear the scientific light of the nineteenth century. To get above nature seems to hav been the cherished conception of ancient barbarism. The fewer comforts and luxuries mankind hav been able to provide for themselvs here, the more zealously hav they pursued the phantoms of imagination. To supply their real wants it was thought easier to conquer neighboring nations than to conquer the elements, the true cornucopia of their poets and philosophers. To supply their imaginary wants, ease and luxury, it was more convenient to locate them in a supernal hereafter than to wring them from the heartless bosom of mother earth. To learn how nature is making vast luminaries throughout the otherwise hideous darkness of space, and surrounding these torch-lights with inhabitable worlds, was then ingeniously avoided by substituting fiat for natural law. It was never difficult to invent a word, without even a shadow of definition, to which this fiat power could be attributed.

"In the beginning God made," though a self-evident falsehood, has been asserted and repeated until few hav the nerve to doubt it. Whoever has so mastered nature and her inexorable laws as to see the impossibility of such a God-made beginning, must either conceal his thoughts or submit to social ostracism. Because this God-making idea can never be reconciled with either growth or evolution, must the truth still be sacrificed to such a monstrous conception? Shall we never cease speaking of the infinit universe as a limited something which must hav been made—the act of making which must then hav occurred at a specified time? To warrant this pueril assumption of a beginning, we should certainly be informed as to the date of its conception—how much time lapsed between the conception and birth of such an uncommon event—why the idea was sprung in the great mind capable of materializing it—why the thing did not appear sooner—why an eternity was wasted before souls of so much importance as ours were furnished with a habitation—and what right anyone could hav to thus force a painful existence on us without our consent.

I think it is not difficult to see why the priests, oracles, and astrologers, during the development of civilization, placed this miracle within a few thousand years of their time. The bare idea of millions, to say nothing of vast periods, ages, and eons of time, must hav appalled the ignorance of their day. Because the partially educated minds of our present readers cannot grapple with the eternal idea, they are clinging to a beginning, just as shipwrecked people cling to a shattered mast—they feel sure of being lost without it. Too much time for weak thinkers, like too much light for weak eyes, overpowers them, and does more harm than good. Until we are all familiar with the endless growth and decay of worlds, suns, etc., as we now comprehend the reproduction and decay of forest trees, and can link those long eons required to decorate the celestial domain with new organisms, where the old ones hav all passed away, the fathomless depth of hoary time must remain a stranger to our feeble powers of thought.

Because man is said to make things, it is easy to conceive the God-making idea—but the former makes nothing. Man can only giv shape to that which has grown by atomic accretion, as cells or crystals, into trees, rocks, etc. The idea of making something out of nothing, and making the space in which to put it, in the beginning, should never be compared to our own mechanical instinct to toy with the solids already about us. If we once realize that infinit space, the inexorable fractions of which we are measuring from the cradle to the grave, could never hav been made, even out of nothing, because its space must hav been there before, then the God-making business appears limited, and of necessity finite. If he did make matter out of nothing, which could not be, we still find in space a superior, necessarily self-existing power underlying his grandest operations. He is but a villein, or tenant at will, on the domain of old Time and Space, who had for a long while been running the business before he set up in the creation trade.

Let any of us complain of the unknown, or unknowable, character of this putativ maker to an orthodox, or Agnostic, which is little better, and we are informed that finite minds must not expect to comprehend the infinit. We hav even been told that science must glean the entire universe before it can prove the truth of Materialism, because God may lurk where science has not been, and thus avoid a dreaded discovery. Why he should be trying to do so we are not satisfactorily informed. To me all such sophistry is preposterous. Certainly, all clear minds can realize the infinity of space, and still we are measuring it with tape-lines and conquering it with steam and electricity. Who does not know that numbers are infinit, yet our children continue to learn the multiplication-table with ease? If the universe is a real infinity—and none can doubt it—are our life-journeys outside of it, that we should remain profoundly ignorant of whatever possesses the attribute of infinity? Why, the fact is, each finite atom is a part of the infinit whole, and no something else can exist within this domain.

In connection with the cosmical question, let all truth seekers and investigators drop the words "origin," "create," and "beginning." Let us learn that the hated Newtonian law of attraction of gravitation is mightier in the world-making business than all of the millions of gods inhabiting empty tenements in the human skull. It builds every solid in the universe, from the simplest crystalline form to the largest self-luminous orb. By its centripetal force, increasing in the ratio of increasing diameter, it evolves the counter or centrifugal force, heat, which maintains the equilibrium between massiv and melted, crystalline and ethereal, matter—between heat and cold, light and darkness—to the end that normal relations must never vary. To this same hated law must be referred the weight of everything on the surfaces of the planets—the weight of our atmosphere and the rotundity of our oceans. It alone resists the tangential motion of all spheres revolving in orbits around other and larger spheres. It not only controls these orbits, but the velocities of each and all revolving spheres can be easily and rationally traced to this same attraction of gravitation, which is nothing more nor less than the involutions of atomic affinity.

As surely as pollen grains develop into seeds, which in turn may become plantlets, capable of growing into saplings, and then larger trees, before they attain the maximum of their species, and ultimately die and surrender their stores of atoms to the common soil; so must we learn how crystals unite into aerolites, which collectivly form asteroids, capable of developing into satellites, and then into planets similar to the one on which we liv. Instead of this world having been made in an impossible beginning, it has been making itself for more than a hundred million years, by the constant accretion of the crystalline matter forming in space, and is still only an infant among the older and vastly larger planets in this system. The repeated deposits of superior geological strata, one above another, for more than a dozen miles beneath its present surface, each filled with fossil plants and animals entirely different from each other, leaves no rational room for doubting this conclusion. Instead of finding in this little world of ours the evidence of its being a creature, as has long been claimed, geology has proved it to be a self-maker, by the attraction of gravitation busily piling superficial layer on layer, which can hardly be completed until it reaches the magnitude of Jupiter, at least. In this way alone can it furnish the inhabitants of each coming age with a virgin soil, while the fossils and contagious excretions of the past are being buried out of reach. In this way all of the matter composing the largest planets has been brought into play and utility by the myriad races from age to age living upon their surfaces. Neither a wise God nor a practical and ever economic nature could with any degree of common sense be accused of making solid globes thousands of miles in diameter for plants and animals to utilize only a few feet of their surfaces.

Chicago, June 20, 1888. MILLESON.

Kindliness and Truth.

It seems almost impossible to make an article so impersonal that some one will not feel as if trodden upon and wish to turn and sting you.

In all my controversies with Spiritualists I hav tried to cultivate a feeling of true kindliness and good-will, and yet despite it all some few hav been angered even to a bitter enmity.

Policy would say, if you cannot believe you should remain silent, and thus retain your friends; but there is one thing I value even above friends, and that is truth—truth won through a clear conscience and the highest effort for its advancement.

It hurts cruelly when friends insist one is "intolerant," simply because one finds it impossible to believe the incredible, and frankly says so. I indorse the sentiment of McArthur when he says, "With our present surroundings we are just as good as we can be; and if one man be better than his neighbor it is due to his opportunities, and to them alone," for, taking in heredity and education, we are just what these hav made us.

I am sorry indeed if I hav ever seemed to show any of "the spirit that deluged our earth with blood" in support of any myth, fallacy, or error, for truly hav I tried ever to work with an eye single to truth and in the spirit of "sweetness and light."

If I fail to clothe my ideas in words that impress readers kindly, it is truly to be deplored, for I thereby mislead to my own detriment.

I may hav been "unfortunate" in my investigations among mediums, but I hav been honest, earnest, and sincere. I hav had hundreds of letters from them and still receive more and more, and nearly all couched in friendly and kindly terms. But not one ray of "light" comes from a single one of them.

Why is it that in a long search of half a century I hav found no proof that the dead still liv? Wallace, Varley, and Crookes may hav been the peers of any of our living scientists, and still hav been just as incompetent, from bias, heredity, and other influences, to judge as to the real origin and cause of the phenomena they saw and tried to test, as many a lesser light would hav been.

All minds do not run in one channel. A fact that is proof to one of some theory, will be proof to another of a very different theory. The fact is denied by neither, but the why of it and the conclusions drawn from it they disagree about till actual science settles it one way or the other.

A man gets in a terrible rage and swears, blasphemes, and curses, and finally drops dead in his rage. The pious cry out that the deity he insulted has taken his life, while the hygienist and physician say his own terrible temper destroyed body and mind and wiped his identity from existence.

I hav over and over assured friends I never denied spirit phenomena as a whole, though I believe much of it is trick and sleight-of-hand, fraud and deception, and some is self-delusion.

It is the little that is real, that I am earnestly seeking a solution of.

I was very glad when Mr. Burr commenced investigation at my request. Being for years personally acquainted with him and his wife, and knowing Mr. Burr as one of the most reliable of all our historical writers, I felt I could trust him implicitly. I do not doubt that all has occurred precisely as they narrate in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I do doubt the causes of the seeming facts. I doubt independent slate-writing, and the dematerialization of coat and vest, and the reality of the appearing of the dead.

What it all is, and how it is done, I know not, and must await further developments.

I am in love with life, and would gladly advance "one round on the ladder of progress" instead of sleeping the last long sleep.

It is hard to die just when life seems full of opportunities—when one has gathered gems of knowledge through years of experience, and learned how best to use them for the world's highest good.

When one is best fitted for life's duties and life's enjoyments, it seems infinitly sad that all must be ended in a dreamless oblivion.

But how can we hope for continuance of advancement when the communications from the supposed ladder-climbers show so little of it? True, the "messages" are full of love, kindliness, charity, and all the virtues, but where are the garnered gems of wisdom? Where is the gathered and accumulated knowledge of the machinist and the inventor? Where are the unrivaled songs and music of the passed-on artists? Where is one grand painting produced by or through a single medium—an immortal gem of art such as Raphael should now be able to produce? Where are the invaluable prescriptions that great physicians with countless years of continual study and experience should be able to now transmit to us?

Friends, I ask these questions not in a spirit of banter, or levity, or opposition, but from a sincere desire that truth and only truth should be our goal.

I am just as glad to grasp a fact as anyone can possibly be, and to know the real cause of that fact. With nearly all of life behind me, think you I would not hail with infinit joy a possible happy future, full of light, hope, and love?

But if death ends all, this fact should be accepted with philosophy and contentment, because it is the inevitable.

I would resolve with all my heart,
With all my powers true peace pursue;
Nor from these precepts e'er depart,
Which hav the good of man in view.

The "Mormon Problem."

From the Denison, Tex., Sunday Gazetteer.

The work accomplished by Protestant missionaries in "converting" the Mormons in Salt Lake City is said to be comparativly trifling. The believers in the inspiration of the Book of Mormon, substantiated as it is by the sworn statements and death-bed testimony of the witnesses to its supernatural origin, cannot see anything superior in the claims put forth for the Old and New Testaments. They appear to hav adopted the safe-side plan urged by the clergy in discussing with Freethinkers, and stick to both books. But while the missionaries meet with such little encouragement in making proselytes from the followers of Joe Smith, the lecturers of the American Secular Union, who hav been prosecuting their labors in that field, hav been greeted with crowded houses nightly, and report the field ripe for the harvest. Freethought has certainly gained a firm foothold in Salt Lake City, and made many converts from the Mormon church, and is in some respects the most formidable foe the Mormon leaders hav to contend with. It would not be surprising if it should prove the solution of the Mormon problem in Utah at an early day. The experiment is certainly superior to the oppressiv policy pursued by the government, and is worthy of general encouragement.

A life member and vice-president of the American Secular Union heads the roll, a sturdy pioneer of Western progress and also of Freethought, with a generous contribution. In May last the flower-embowered residence of Mr. and Mrs. Goodell was besieged by societies and people of all shades of opinion, who brought golden treasures rich and rare as tokens of appreciation and remembrance of their golden wedding. They accepted the interpretation of Cicero that friendship is the only thing concerning the utility of which all mankind agree. Orthodox and heterodox, Infidel and Christian, all were eager to pay homage to a couple whose unsullied lives, domestic joys, and noble deeds did honor to their diverse professions, proving that it is not so much what we think but what we are that adds to or detracts from what we espouse. Mr. Goodell's name is inscribed where future generations will honor those who helped to make them truly free.

Mr. Riggen, another friend from fair California, keeps up his dues in the American Secular Union and sends for bunting to keep the flag of freedom afloat. He is a live, energetic Liberal, who livs in Los Angeles, notwithstanding the bemoans "of the peregrinating blasphemer," who should take pains to be accurate occasionally. Mr. Riggen is an old member.

Professor Orchardson is our iconoclast. He's a student and philosopher. His lectures drop like muriatic acid on orthodoxy. He studied at the Royal Academy, where his brother is the head of that institution. Fine arts and Radicalism are not conducciv to financial success, and when, in addition, he is laboring to pay taxes on an unproductiv Michigan peach farm, it deters him from doing what he would like to for the cause. He writes me:

FRIEND STEVENS: This will, I hope, keep you from being that much too generous in your disinterested and indefatigable efforts for the success of the Union.

Admiringly, CHAS. ORCHARDSON.

T. J. McCleary, president of the Stayton (Ore.) Secular Union, forwards $5 for the charter, and desires that their forces shall be thoroughly equipped when Captain Putnam will review them on his tour of general inspection. They propose to adopt the first syllable of their name and stay. Nelson R. Adams, vice-president; F. S. Mallison, secretary; Wm. Brown, assistant secretary; W. S. Waters, treasurer.

Mr. and Mrs. Fray each join our loyal host, and will aid in dispelling the power of ignorance to strangle our laws, and, though surrounded by orthodox influences, sturdily maintain their ground.

C. H. Kidder is a thorough-going Liberal friend of our local society, who always says, "Whenever you want a few dollars, Stevens, call on me." Mr. Kidder can giv as good a lecture as many a man of more pretentious learning. He is an old comrade of the war—brainy and generous.

Brother W. H. Tyree writes from the charming summer resort region of West Virginia, Kanawha Falls, and sends some enticing views and descriptions of its wild and weird scenery. In lieu of a divine blessing he forwards a few dollars, which we can utilize to much better advantage. His and Brother Howran's flattering words—too strong for reproduction—make us feel deeply grateful for the appreciation.

John G. Palmer is evidently a gentleman of culture, a clear and lucid writer, and interested in gathering information relativ to our work.

Mr. Hayden informs us that he has held seven debates with the ablest divines in that part of Missouri, and he is anxious to try conclusions with Clark Braden. He has done considerable lecturing in that neighborhood, and is desirous of more engagements.

Miss V. de Cleyre met Vice-President J. W. Black at Philadelphia, where she recently lectured, and interested that sturdy veteran in the cause financially. Miss V. de Cleyre has a taking way with her, and she captured the other friends for the amounts named, for which we acknowledge our thanks to the donors and the collector.

Still the amount is not half enough to pay current expenses, and we again appeal to those who hav not contributed this year to aid us—just now.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Colonel Ingersoll and His Family.

From the World of Sunday, July 1st.

A stalwart form in the city throng is Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. Where he walks, men turn and look. When he speaks, all pause to listen. When he writes, the multitude reads. Induce him to deliver a public speech, whether it be in the form of eulogy over the dead or assault upon superstition and sophistry, and thousands hang enraptured upon the marvelous eloquence of his words. With the late Roscoe Conkling, Colonel Ingersoll shared more than any other private citizen in the United States the familiar interest of this community, which prides itself particularly in not having any interest in anything.

Crowds of celebrated men and noted women pass unheeded in the swarming streets of the metropolis. Any one of them might be a center of curious interest in almost any other city in America, possibly barring Washington. Here they are as completely lost as though life had never known them. New York, in its supreme superiority, delights more than anything in calmly dismissing the men who hav grown celebrated elsewhere with a leaden stare which says, "We never heard of you. Good day."

But here and there a man towers so far above his neighbors that even the placid patronage of the big city is stirred to interest. Colonel Ingersoll has what honor there may be in the knowledge that the great, self-satisfied city watches him with a kindly air and is as near to being proud of him as metropolitan dignity will permit. It even permits itself to refer to him with tender familiarity as "Bob."

In his fifty-sixth year, Colonel Ingersoll looks a man of forty or forty-two. Probably more than any other person in the United States he is surrounded with people who hold him in almost tender regard. Few men of rich mental power that asserts itself in debate escape the bitter assaults of hostil opponents. The late Zach Chandler once observed: "Show me a man without enemies and I will show you a man who isn't worth a damn." But Mr. Chandler did not liv to know Colonel Ingersoll in the zenith of his celebrity, or he would probably hav acknowledged that his rule, like most others, had an exception. Ingersoll has many combatants, but his real, serious, personal enemy hasn't been discovered.

"People may find fault with his theories," observed an acquaintance the other day, "but they can't condemn his personality. They may differ with him on almost every subject in the world, but they can't criticise his daily life."

What is his daily life?

Well, it is worth knowing something about. In his office it is the life of an exceedingly busy and thoughtful lawyer. In his home it is the life of an exceptionally tender husband and loving father. There are few men so universally sought after who are so closely devoted to the ties of home and wife and offspring. And there are few, perhaps, who possess such ripe return in the fulness of affection, respect, and honor that is Colonel Ingersoll's reward.

The Ingersoll household, at No. 400 Fifth avenue, consists of Mr. and Mrs. Robert G. Ingersoll, Miss Eva Ingersoll, Miss Maud Ingersoll, Mr. and Mrs. Clinton P. Farrell, Mrs. Parker, the mother of Mrs. Ingersoll, and Miss Sharkey, who held the post of governess until the Misses Ingersoll were grown, and now assists Mrs. Ingersoll in the care of the household. Mrs. Farrell is Mrs. Ingersoll's sister, and her husband is the publisher of Colonel Ingersoll's works, together with all the other standard literature of the Agnostic and scientific schools, including the writings of Voltaire, Paine, Franklin, Tyndall, Huxley, and many more.

Happiness dwells also in that household. Music and laughter welcome the incoming guest at almost any hour of the day or evening, and there is no time for repining or bitterness or harshness in the Ingersoll establishment. In all that makes home lovely this house is rich. It is interesting to the eye. Its decorations are manifold and rare. There are specimens of the best work of the best artists of the time; there are curiously carved idols from India and Japan; there are engrossed testimonials from distant spots, of which any man might be proud; there are rare bits of bric-a-brac from all over the world; there are no less than fifty walking-sticks of various designs and values, and there are rich furnishings and all the other comforts of a well-appointed home.

Colonel Ingersoll's daughters are brilliant girls. Not in the sense that society terms its girls brilliant; for they are not shallow, and frivolity does not babble when they speak. They are brainy. They hav read and studied deeply. They hav a fine scientific knowledge, and they talk thoughtfully on all topics of the time. Still, these two young ladies hav by no means neglected themselvs in the lighter accomplishments. They are fine musicians, and they possess in a remarkable degree the gift of entertainment. One of them, Miss Maud, is the possessor of a remarkable memory. She has stored up in her mind a vast amount of knowledge, which she recalls in the most minute manner and with the greatest apparent ease. Without the slightest hesitation she can tell, for instance, the date of birth or death of any important composer, and can recall any event of moment in his career. Tnis quite unusual gift she carries into other fields, and her information is so widespread and so accurate that but for her singularly winsome manner ordinary folks would be quite afraid to talk to her.

Both daughters resemble their father, not alone in feature, but in that intrepid independence of thought and act which must be characteristic of all the Ingersolls. Only a few weeks ago Miss Eva Ingersoll distinguished herself by an act of personal bravery that was remarkable not alone by reason of having been accomplished by a member of the gentler sex. The young lady is a member of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and she takes a very deep interest in the carrying out of the designs with which the association was formed. One day, as she sat looking out of the window over Fifth avenue, she saw a mau beating a poor, shrunken, decrepit old horse attached to an ash-cart. The young lady's sympathy was aroused at once, and with it her indignation. She went out into the street and asked the driver to abandon his ill-treatment of the unfortunate brute under his charge. He told her to go to the devil, and as a means of self employment during the journey he continued to hammer the horse. Miss Ingersoll called upon a bystander to interfere. The bystander refused. She then exhibited her S. P. C. A. badge. The driver jeered at her and went on thumping the unfortunate horse. Miss Ingersoll seized the bridle and was dragged along the pavements, to the great astonishment of a lot of people in masculin clothing, who looked on and said nothing. Finally a man rushed out from the sidewalk and stopped the procession. A policeman approached, the brutal driver was arrested, and the wretched old horse was turned over to the society. The animal was found to be in such a condition of illness that it was considered necessary to shoot it outright, and the driver was duly punished for his cruelty.

A good many Fifth avenue fathers would hav shrunk from the publicity occasioned by such an act on the part of a daughter. Colonel Ingersoll didn't. He commended this brave and humane conduct, and so did pretty much everybody who knew about it. Indeed, two such girls as the Misses Ingersoll could do nothing that would bring from their father words other than those of praise. First, because two more honest, brave girls are nowhere to be found. Second, because they are beloved of a father in whom harshness of thought or word does not exist. Indeed, there are no words that can convey the world of deep affection which passes between husband and wife, parents and children, in this altogether remarkable family. Said Mr. Dwight Townsend the other day, in a conversation with the writer of this sketch: "During an acquaintance that has extended over twenty-five years, I never knew a sharp word to be uttered in that family. In fact, it is throughout the happiest household one can possibly imagin. Colonel Ingersoll's family occupy the first place in his affections, and one is particularly struck with his devotion to them in the time of illness. When his wife is not well he allows no one to wait upon her but himself, and even the shrill complaints of people by whom he has been engaged to perform some important act of duty fall unheeded upon his ear at such a time as this. He insists upon preparing all her meals, adjusts everything even to the napkin, and refuses to take food himself until she has partaken of nourishment. Nor is his really phenomenal devotion without its compensation. Mrs. Ingersoll is one of the proudest women in the world of her husband. In truth, no one who comes often in contact with the lady can fail to be impressed with the perfect content that pervades her whole being. Her whole life is wrapped up in her husband and her children, and none of them find pleasure outside their home without his presence. To be invited to join the picnicking excursions in which this truly remarkable family often indulge themselvs in spring or autumn is indeed a treat never to be forgotten.

Mr. Townsend, who has been one of the most loyal and unswerving of Colonel Ingersoll's admiring friends for a number of years, speaks of him with an enthusiasm that is born of conviction. Said he: "My acquaintance with him and his family arose in 1864, when his brother, Ebon C. Ingersoll, and myself were members of the Thirty-eighth Congress. My relations with his brother, at once cordial and intimate, were cemented by a rencontre with the erratic Senator Douglass, of California. It arose at a reception and led to the verge of a duel. During the exciting moments he behaved with such intrepidity and coolness that I was drawn to him unspeakably. My fondness and admiration for Colonel Ingersoll's brother brought me at once into warm friendship for the colonel himself. He fairly idolized his brother Ebon, and any man who was a friend of that brave and able gentleman is welcome to Robert's heart and hand. As everyone realizes who meets the colonel, he draws the most indifferent and prejudiced finally to love him. I hav, of course, joined the ranks. During the last ten years I hav been associated with him in various matters before Congress and elsewhere, and for the past three years I hav scarcely missed a day without seeing him. I am indeed proud of his friendship."

This brother, Ebon C. Ingersoll, to whom Mr. Townsend referred, represented in Congress from 1864 to 1872 the Peoria district in Illinois. He succeeded Lovejoy, who was assassinated. Ingersoll was much more than an ordinary speaker. Indeed, the gift of oratory is strongly developed throughout the family, having been inherited, no doubt, from the father, who, by the way, was a doctor of divinity. Another brother, Dr. John Ingersoll, living at Waukesha, Wis., is a noted speaker on the subject of temperance. He was the Prohibition candidate for governor in 1884, and he very closely resembles his more celebrated brother, although he keeps strictly to himself his religious views, and in that respect is, as Mr. Francis Wilson would observe, "not the same."

Ebon Ingersoll had much the same sense of humor as that which characterizes the famous advocate concerning whom all this is written. His fun on more than one occasion convulsed the House. At one time, when two members—one of them Daniel Voorhies—were engaged in a dispute so hot and violent that pretty much all the members had gathered about them to see how soon they would come to blows, Ebon Ingersoll began to address the chair. Mr. Blaine, who was the Speaker, called him to order, but Ingersoll, in the blandest manner possible and with an eloquent wave of his hand, replied: "Mr. Speaker, I decline to be interrupted!" The effect was magical. The whole House burst into a roar of laughter, in which the previous warfare was completely drowned, and even Mr. Blaine was so completely captured by the humor of a member who declined to be interrupted by the Speaker, that he joined in the general merriment and allowed Ingersoll to proceed for some moments. The members during this time resumed their seats and business was quietly resumed, as though nothing had happened to disturb its even flow. Ebon Ingersoll died in 1879, and it was his demise that brought forth from his brother that celebrated and exquisit eulogy that has been regarded as the greatest burst of tender eloquence since Shakspere's speech of Mark Antony over the body of Julius Cæsar.

Colonel Ingersoll's method of preparing for a public speech is simple and effectiv. Many people in the vast audiences who hav listened to his flowing eloquence hav wondered if his effects were entirely produced upon the spur of the moment, or if his orations were carefully worked up beforehand and then committed to memory. Neither of these theories is entirely correct. Colonel Ingersoll has in his employ a thoroughly efficient stenographer named Baker, and when his material for a speech or an extended letter is all in hand, he dictates the entire thing from beginning to end. The stenographer subsequently writes it out upon the type writer, and it is read over once or twice by Colonel Ingersoll, by which time the thread of the argument is thoroughly fixed in his mind. He then prepares a series of headings of the various points he desires to cover, and when he goes into court or mounts the rostrum he is armed with these headings. He has no need to commit mere words and figures of speech to memory. He has a singular wealth of language in which to clothe his argument, whatever it may be, and his only difficulty is to recall himself to the main track, after being led off to one side or the other by the flood of his own eloquence.

It is this marked facility of phrasing that has done much to distinguish Colonel Ingersoll. His power of portrayal is remarkably vivid and graphic, and his phrases of denunciation and of praise remain equally impressed upon the hearer. It was he who gave Mr. Blaine the "Plumed Knight" title, a descriptiv term that has ever since clung to the man from Maine. The words were spoken in Cincinnati in June, 1876, when Colonel Ingersoll introduced Mr. Blaine's name to the Republican national convention. The paragraph in which the phrase occurred ran as follows: "Like an armed warrior, like a plumed knight, James G. Blaine marched down the halls of the American Congress, and threw his shining lance full and fair against the brazen foreheads of the defamers of his country and the maligners of her honor."

A question that very frequently arises, and has up to this time received no satisfactory public reply, has reference to the reasons which hav actuated Colonel Ingersoll in abandoning his career as a lecturer. It is quite well known that no public speaker has ever been able in this country to attract such large audiences or to exact such terms as Ingersoll when he is in the humor. He has indeed received offers for extended lecture tours that are almost fabulous, and many of these offers hav come from men of the utmost responsibility, concerning whose ability to carry out their contracts no one has any doubt. Their continued rejection has occasioned a widely accepted report that Colonel Ingersoll does not like to lecture, but prefers the more laborious life of a deeply occupied lawyer. This is not entirely correct. As a matter of fact, his refusal to accept contracts to speak for any length of time in public is occasioned simply by the fact that the work involves his frequent absence from home and keeps him away from his family. Nothing but the absolute need of funds—a need that is in no sense likely to arise, since Colonel Ingersoll's income from his practice is large and steady—would induce him to return to the platform, unless he should wish to hav his say for once upon some topic of interest at the moment. If he could be induced to return to the platform, Colonel Ingersoll might readily secure two engagements a day just as long as his health would stand the strain. As it is, he prefers to continue his practice at the bar in this city, and it is only very rarely that he is taken away from home on flying trips to make arguments in important suits.

In his boyhood Ingersoll was not trained for the law. In point of fact, his first employment was in the capacity of a school-teacher out in Illinois. Even in those early days he had developed a strong tendency to disbelieve in the dogmas and creeds of the church, and he had no more hesitation then than he has at this day in making his sentiments publicly known. The consequence was that he could not retain his post as a teacher of young people. Parents and school trustees were greatly shocked at what they deemed his violent and unjustifiable utterances, and they reflected with terror upon what might be the result of his teachings so far as the young idea of the neighborhood was concerned. So Pedagog Ingersoll was unable to continue in his chosen calling, and was induced by his brother Ebon to join that gentleman in the practice of the law. For some years the two brothers fought cow cases and other suits of that type, in which the then remote districts of Illinois abounded. Gradually both of them became widely known, not alone for their knowledge of the law, but by reason of their gifts of oratory. Both had wonderful strength in addressing juries, and they often in those days practiced in the same courts with Lincoln, Logan, and many others who rose to great eminence.

When the war broke out Ingersoll went to the front as colonel of an Illinois cavalry regiment. He made an exceedingly good record as a soldier, and the story of his capture by the Confederates is characteristic. He and his command had been sent out to delay Forrest's advance into Corinth, and sharp engagements occurred, during which Colonel Ingersoll's forces were driven back. In attempting to jump his horse over an adjoining fence the animal fell, and before the colonel could remount he was surrounded by Southern troops and a dozen muskets were aimed at him. With that inimitable drollery that has marked him under all circumstances, no matter how trying, Ingersoll threw up both his hands and exclaimed: "Say, you fellows, where is this Southern Confederacy, anyhow? I hav been looking for it for the past half hour with a view to surrendering."

The soldiers did not fire, but laughingly took him into custody, and carried him to headquarters. General Forrest personally examined him, and Colonel Ingersoll, who thought it wise to conceal his own identity, professed an absolute ignorance of the commander under whom he had been serving. Forrest, who failed utterly to get any satisfaction out of the Union officer, sent him to the guard-house, where he chaffed and joked the Southern soldiers for a couple of hours, at the end of which time one of them reported to General Forrest that the prisoner was "no ordinary man." Thereupon the Confederate commander sent for Colonel Ingersoll, and this time the Yankee told who he was. Forrest apparently had a hearty enjoyment of Ingersoll's quaint sayings, and took such a strong personal fancy to him that within a very few days he was paroled. This was one of the last occasions on which that honor was extended to a Northern soldier at the hands of a Southern general. After the war was over, when Colonel Ingersoll was in Washington, this same General Forrest, then in shattered circumstances, presented himself to Colonel Ingersoll and received many kindnesses and considerable assistance at his hands.

At the urgent solicitation of his brother Ebon, Colonel Ingersoll removed in 1878 to Washington, and took up the practice of law in that city. But such urgent appeals came to him from all parts of the country to lecture and take up cases that he was but little in Washington, and he was thus finally induced to giv up the lecture field altogether, and confine himself to the law. He was widely known in the West long before this as an advocate of great power. He had served as attorney-general in Illinois, when General "Dick" Oglesby first occupied the gubernatorial office. There was a warm friendship between the two, and it exists to this day. Governor Oglesby never fails when he visits the East to call upon Colonel Ingersoll, and a jolly lot of reminiscences of their early days is sure to be brought out. In the old days, Oglesby, "Sam" Weldon, now judge of the court of claims, and a few other congenial spirits, used to congregate in Colonel Ingersoll's rooms, and it was only by the adoption of stern tactics that he could ever induce them to leave. He finally took up a system under which he usually succeeded in getting rid of them. Promptly at 2:30 o'clock in the morning the colonel would put the poker in the stove, and that became a signal for their departure after he had upon one or two occasions been compelled to employ it at 4 in the morning, as an inducement to his guests to clear out. There are almost countless anecdotes of his early life at the bar. It is related by one of Colonel Ingersoll's friends that upon a certain occasion in addressing a jury in behalf of a man who was being tried for the murder of a neighbor, the crime having arisen out of a dispute concerning land, Colonel Ingersoll pictured the occasion, when both men were wildly excited, and one of them in a moment of passion struck the fatal blow and was really at the moment insane. The colonel then proceeded to describe, in a voice filled with emotion, how on the preceding day he had attended the funeral of one of the children of the prisoner at the bar. He recalled in moving terms the grief-stricken mother and the forsaken family, and then told how, after the funeral, one of the little children looked up at him and said, knowing he was one of its father's friends, "When will papa come home?" Colonel Ingersoll stopped for a moment at this point, and then in tones intensely dramatic exclaimed: "Gentlemen, will you let this poor man go home?" The jury were deeply moved by this appeal, and one of them, entirely carried away by Ingersoll's fervor, jumped up in his place and shouted at the top of his lungs, "Yes, Bob, you bet we will."

And they did.

A few days ago a case was tried in this city in which Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Choate were pitted against each other. Ingersoll represented the plaintiff, who had sued a corporation for breach of contract. The case was being closed, and Mr. Choate rose and addressed the jury. He commenced by saying there was only one point about the suit of which he stood in fear, and that point was the presence of Colonel Ingersoll as the opposing attorney. "I suppose, gentlemen," observed Mr. Choate, impressivly, "that Colonel Ingersoll has pulled the wool over the eyes of more jurymen than any other lawyer in this country." The celebrated lawyer then proceeded for half an hour to pour a perfect torrent of personal attack upon the plaintiff, who was a small man physically, and who sat almost heartbroken and completely crushed under accusations of blackmail and general villainy as they were hurled at him by Lawyer Choate. When that gentleman had finished, Colonel Ingersoll arose, and, after retorting to the effect that Mr. Choate's personal compliment to himself was an insult to the intelligence of the jury, he took up his client's case, and attacking one after another the arguments set forward by the opposing counsel, he eulogized the character of his client in such elequent and effectiv terms that when he closed the man sprang forward from his seat, seized Colonel Ingersoll's hand, and exclaimed: "I do not care for the verdict now. You hav vindicated me." He did get the verdict, however, to the full amount of his claim, with an additional allowance besides.

Colonel Ingersoll says that sometimes opposing counsel "back their tails up like squirrels, against the church, and bark." In other words, they attempt to use the prejudices of orthodox people in their legal warfare. Such tactics usually lead to the defeat of their promoters, and on one occasion, in a trial for murder, when the Colonel was defending the accused, he exclaimed, pointing at the opposing counsel: "He would like you to hang my client because I differ with him on the question of religion." Then, as upon other occasions where the same tactics had been observed, the colonel was victorious.

One of the most famous cases in which Colonel Ingersoll has been engaged during his legal career was the trial of Stephen Dorsey, in what became historic as the Star route cases. There were other defendants, and a considerable number of lawyers had been retained. Colonel Ingersoll was one of the lot, and at the start was by no means the most prominent. But it was soon discovered that his capacity was far beyond that of his associates, and the entire charge of the case was turned over to him. The trial lasted for upward of two years, and, although the opinion was almost universal that the defendants would be convicted, Colonel Ingersoll's skilful conduct of the case secured the acquittal of his clients. In some legal circles his handling of the case is regarded as one of the most masterly pieces of legal power and strategy on record.

Everywhere beloved and respected for his purity of life, his tenderness of heart, and his great mental force, Colonel Ingersoll remains one of the rugged and striking figures of the time.

When Colonel Ingersoll was asked for a sketch of his life, this is what he wrote: "I hav never given to anyone a sketch of my life. According to my idea, a life should not be written until it has been lived."

Catholicism's Declaration on Liberty.

I will giv a short exposition of the sentence passed by the Catholic church on liberty of conscience, of opinion, of the press, and of government, according to the encyclical letter of Pope Gregory XVI.

The late Archbishop Spalding, of Baltimore, Md., delivered a lecture in the Maryland Institute of this city, after his return from the last general council of Rome, in which he asserted that he was in favor of republican forms of government, for they allowed freedom in the propagation of the Catholic faith, but as for the monarchies of Europe, he wished them all swept away, and their sites occupied by republics. It is painful to the ears of common honesty to hear a man who claims to be something of a divine being, and above ordinary humanity, publicly indorse doctrins which hav been so frequently anathematized by his church, to the pope and canons of which his consecration oath has so strongly bound him in implicit and unconditional obedience. Pope Gregory, elected in 1831, issued an encyclical letter in August, 1833. An abridgment of this document we will here produce, in order to show that the declarations of the Holy and Right Reverend Archbishop Spalding are in contravention of the regularly defined doctrins of the papal church:

Ever bearing in mind, that the universal church suffers from every novelty, as well as the admonition of St. Agatho, that from what has been regularly defined nothing can be taken away, no innovation introduced there, no addition made, but that it must remain untouched both in words and meaning.

It would also be a crime to cavil at its clashing with the principles of natural law, or to pronounce it lame and imperfect, and subject to civil law.

The church is not subject to restoration and regeneration, . . . as if she should be thought obnoxious to decay and obscurities. . . . The dispensing of the canons has been committed to the Roman pontiff only. . . . in him alone resides the power of making decrees touching the ordinances of the fathers, and also, as St. Gelasius writes, to balance the decrees of the canons, and to determin the precepts of predecessors, so as to direct, after careful consideration, what relaxation the circumstances of the times require for the good of peculiar churches.

From the polluted fountain of indifference flows that absurd and erroneous doctrin, or rather raving, in favor and defense of liberty of conscience, from which most pestilential doctrin the course is opened by that entire and wild liberty of opinion which is everywhere attempting the overthrow of religious and civil institutions, which the unblushing impudence of some hav held forth as an advantage of religion. . . . From hence arises that pest of all others most to be dreaded in a state, unblushing liberty of opinion, licentiousness of speech, and a lust of novelty, which, according to the experience of all ages, portend to the downfall of the most powerful and flourishing empires.

Hence tend (from liberty of opinion) that worst and never sufficiently execrated and detested liberty of the press, for the diffusion of all manner of writing, which some so loudly contend for and activly promote. We shudder, venerable brethren, at the sight of the monstrous doctrins, or rather portentous errors, which crowd upon us in the shape of numberless volumes and pamphlets, small in size, but big with evil, which stalk forth in every direction, breathing a malediction which we deplore over the face of the earth.

The subject (the extirpation of anti-Catholic literature) engaged the closest attention of the fathers of the church at Trent, and as a remedy of so great an evil, they passed that most salutary decree for forming an Index of works in which depraved doctrin was contained. No means must be here omitted, says Clement XIII., our predecessor of happy memory, in the encyclical letter of bad works—no means must be here omitted, as the extremity of the case calls for all our exertion to extirpate the fatal pest that spreads through so many works; nor can the material elements be otherwise exterminated than by the flames, which consume the depraved elements of evil.

Nor can we augur more consoling consequences to religion and to government from the zeal of some to separate the church from the state, and to burst the bands which unite the priesthood to the empire. For it is clear that this union is dreaded by the profane lovers of liberty only because it has never failed to confer prosperity on both.

Having moreover heard that doctrins are circulated among common people in writings subversiv of the fidelity and submission due to princes, and that in consequence the flames of sedition are everywhere kindling, all care must be employed to prevent the people from being seduced from the path of duty. Wherefore both human and divine law cry out against those who by the basest machination of treason and rebellion strive to dissolve the bands of allegiance, and to drive them from their states.

It will be observed that the first part of the pope's letter is in deadly conflict with Spalding's republican assertions; for it expressly declares that from what has been regularly defined nothing can be taken away, no innovation introduced there, no addition made, but that it must remain untouched both in words and meaning; while the subsequent parts of the letter show that the papal church is inveterately opposed to liberty of conscience, to liberty of opinion, to a free press, and to free government. Was the archbishop innocently ignorant? or did he basely stoop to mendaciousness? We know that in the tenth century the priests in general were too illiterate to be able to read, but we are hardly able to conceive that the archbishop of Baltimore was sunk to the same level, yet we are unable to imagin any other mode by which the credit of his reverence can be saved than by according him the benefit of the theory.

The pope stigmatizes "liberty of opinion as an absurd, erroneous, and pestilential doctrin which opens the course for that entire wild, or rather raving, liberty of opinion which overthrows religious and civil institutions." Conscience is the sense of right and wrong; without it man could commit any crime in the catalog of guilt without consciousness or compunction. Opinion is the deduction of truth or error from premises; without it a man would be liable to innocently embrace the most absurd and pernicious principles for the most reasonable and beneficent. These two faculties, conscience and reason, the noblest and most useful attributes of man, the pope denounces as absurd, erroneous, wild, and pestilential. He forbids their exercise—why? Because he knows they will never sanction his errors and misdeeds; because he knows if he can dethrone reason, he can plant himself on its seat in the soul, and dominate with supreme power over its operations; and because he knows that if he can stifle conscience, he can convert a saint into a fiend, ready to commit any atrocity in the interest of the church.

This papal document is an extraordinary specimen of the licentiousness of speech which he condemns, and it would be difficult to find in the annals of literature a production which comprised in the same number of words more erroneous, wild, absurd, pestiferous doctrins that it does. It is estimated that there are nine hundred million inhabitants of the globe each having the powers of perception and observation to acquire knowledge, of memory to retain it, of reason to deduce conclusions from it, of conscience to perceive what is right and wrong, of will to direct the executiv faculties, and of vocal organs to frame thoughts in words and express them in speech; yet the pope, with stupendous absurdity, arrogates the prerogativ of exercising these powers only, and of interdicting their exercise by every other human being. Let it be remembered that these powers are instinctiv, involuntary, incessantly in action, beyond the control of the will, and none can cease to feel and think, or to feel and think as he desires, or can resist the conviction of his judgment, and yet the papal despot claims to be invested with authority from heaven to control the uncontrolable, destroy the indestructible, and do the impossible! A singular degree of vanity and self-importance may hav led him to imagin himself a god, but in this he is egregiously misled, for he is a man, no more, possessing the equal natural rights and privileges of all other men. And it is astounding that with the assumption of the attributes of a god, he should hav been so obtuse as to condemn and anathematize himself in the very act of asserting his pretensions. For how could he hav elaborated and published his encyclical letter without exercising the liberty of conscience, of opinion, and of the press?

Again, the pope denounces the liberty of the press as the worst and never sufficiently execrated and detested institution. He shudders at the monstrous, or rather portentous, errors which crowd upon him in the shape of numberless volumes and pamphlets. No wonder he shuddered at the unanswerable crowd, for they were spirits that could not be laid, nor their ominous gibbering silenced; and as their number has since then considerably increased, it is probable his shuddering has also increased, and will eternally continue to increase, unless the warmth of his climate has a tranquilizing effect on his nerves. But still we opine that had the pope, instead of shuddering and venting his dismay in ebullitions of wrath, exposed the errors of his finite opponent, which would hav been an easy task for his infinit abilities, he would hav acted with more benevolence and dignity, and might hav strengthened his claims to divinity. But from motivs best known to himself he let the golden opportunity pass, and, coinciding with Clement XIII., advised that the prohibited works be consigned to the flames, for the singular reason that flames consume the elements of of evil. If the pope means by this assertion that flames consume the evil elements and not the good, he should hav put his encyclical letter, together with the Douay Bible, the bulls of the popes, the canons of the councils, and other doubtful papal documents in the flames, and tested how far they were invulnerable to the effects of fire and possessed no elements of evil. Why he did not subject them to this convenient criterion, is an inexplicable mystery, unless he had no faith in the truth of his assertion.

The pope, however, flatters himself that the decrees of the Council of Trent for forming an Index of prohibited books found a very salutary remedy for works in which depraved doctrin was contained. It is, however, remarkable that among the depraved and prohibited books cited the Bible, even the Catholic Bible, is included. The fourth rule of the Index declares:

Since it is clear from experience that if the holy scriptures are everywhere permitted, more detriment than profit arises from them by reason of the rashness of man. . . . But in this case [permission to read the Bible] let it be at the option of a bishop or inquisitor. . . . But whosoever shall presume to read or keep them without such power, let him not be able to obtain the absolution of his sins until the books are returned to the ordinary.

Three years after the dissolution of the Council of Trent, Pius V. approved the Index:

The Index prohibits all books censured by the popes before 1515; all books of arch-heretics or minor errorists since 1515; the reading of the Old Testament—except at the discretion of the bishop, to learned and pious persons—and the New Testament absolutely; the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue, unless when a bishop, inquisitor, or recommendation grants the privilege, under heavy penalties. If any book is to be printed, or manuscript issued, it must be submitted to the church, and written consent obtained that it be printed. All book-stores, libraries, and places where books are to be loaned or sold, to be visited by persons deputed by the bishop, so that no prohibited thing be printed, sold, or kept; so that the stores keep and sell no other books, or by any means deliver them, without the license of the same deputy, under pain of confiscation of the books, or other punishment to be inflicted by the bishop or inquisitor. And let the buyers, sellers, readers, and printers be punished at the discretion of the same.

The Index of Trent was in conformity with the spirit and practice of the papal church. Numerous Indexes had before been issued; and the Council of Toulouse in 1229, in its Fifteenth canon, had prohibited the translation of the Bible in the vernacular language, and the laymen to hav the books of the Old and New Testament, but allowed them a psalter, a breviary, and a rosary.

In every century of the history of the papal church there arose able and candid men, who exposed its errors and rebuked its crimes. This class of men embraced all grades in the church, from laymen to popes. The tongue and pen of many able heretics and schismatics also assailed the church with scathing logic, pungent satire, and overpowering eloquence. The cry of reform in the head and body of the church was thundered forth, and echoed and reechoed from land to land. But the pope had no taste for reformation; corruption and demoralization were more remunerativ. He determined therefore to maintain the church unchanged in its pollution and dissoluteness, to assert its infallibility that he might claim its crimes as virtues and its errors as truths, and as it could not withstand the tide of logic and learning that threatened its safety, he determined to exterminate liberty of conscience, opinion, and the press, from which it arose, and involve the world in impervious ignorance, that it might not discover the deformity of its character and the unscrupulousness of its usurpations. The Indexes were an important instrument in the accomplishment of this treason to literature. They interdicted not only heretical but orthodox works; works of Catholic popes, cardinals, bishops, priests, monks, and laymen; works historical, philosophical, scientific, and literary—everything inimical to the pretensions of the papal despot. Sixtus V., elected in 1590, published a Bible in the Italian language, with a bull of recommendation, which the Spanish Inquisition condemned.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

SANTA CLARA, CAL., May 16th, 17th, and 18th.—I expected to go from Monterey to Watsonville, but it happened no hall could be obtained, so I went to Santa Clara, and there found that eccentric but highly esteemed, stanch, honest, outspoken old veteran, John H. Dibble, who made me welcome, and arranged for three lectures at the Turners' hall. I enjoyed a delightful visit with his happy and very interesting family.

On May 15th Dr. York and his estimable wife called on me at Brother Dibble's, and for the first time I had the pleasure to grasp the hand of this sturdy old hero of a thousand campaigns. Age has not dimmed the fire of his zeal, nor the dauntless resolution and combativness of his nature. He has more get up and get, more vigor and push, than any three other lecturers in the field combined. None can equal Dr. York in raking together the smoldering embers, and fanning them into a roaring flame. I was glad to meet the sturdy old pioneer who did battle for the cause in times when to do so "tried men's souls."

Dr. York and wife came from San José to attend my first lecture at Santa Clara. The doctor presided, and at its close put the cap sheaf on my lecture by his burning words of impassioned fervor. The attendance was very slim, but greatly increased at each subsequent lecture, and the interest became very great.

Santa Clara is progressiv in every respect, and thus far has escaped the curse of a "boom."

Friend Dibble is another evidence that living out the principles of Liberalism, and courteously but fearlessly avowing convictions, does not injure business. He has accumulated a comfortable competency in spite of opposition. His son, who now carries on the business—plumbing and tinsmithing—is the most independent, outspoken young fellow in ten counties, yet everyone respects him. He is a thorough master of his trade, and conducts the business, as did his father before him, on strictly Infidel principles, and has made a grand success.

In compliance with their kindly invitation, I visited Dr. York and wife at their home in San José. Dr. York insisted on my delivering at least one lecture there. Among the very kind friends I found at San José were Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Schwartz, than whom more earnest and devoted workers for Liberalism cannot be found. Mrs. Schwartz donated the most beautiful flowers in her garden, and adorned the rostrum at the hall with exquisit taste. Mr. and Mrs. Schwartz are very able musicians, and enlivened the meeting by playing inspiring melodies. There was good attendance, comprising the most intelligent and highly cultured ladies and gentlemen of San José. Dr. York made the opening address and read a poem. My lecture on "Life's Duties, or What Liberalism Teaches," was listened to with every sign of deep interest, and at its close I received the compliments and kind greeting of a host of friends. A very general desire was expressed for my speedy return, they promising me the use of the largest hall and full attendance.

San José is a wide-awake, flourishing city of great beauty, and it contains within itself another city, the Chinese. A real China town, blocks and blocks of two-story brick houses and stores occupied exclusivly by the Chinese. I am under no obligation to defend the coast, or justify that which is evil, as I hav no ax to grind. I write of persons and things as they really are, or at least as I see and find them.

I do not admire Chinese, either individually or collectivly. I admit they are workers, indefatigable workers, naturally industrious. I do not therefore wish them all comfortably laid away in little beds in the deepest bed of the ocean. No! I admit I should not risk injury to my eyes by excess of weeping if I should learn such was the fate of all the noble Indians and gentle Mexican Greasers; but the Chinese are workers, a virtue that entitles them to consideration; my only desire is that each and every one of them who hopes to be buried in his or her nativ land may hav that very laudable wish gratified at the earliest possible moment. I wish the Chinese well, when in their own country. I admire their love of their nativ soil, and heartily wish they may ever remain in it, or on it, or under it—it is perfectly immaterial which, as I am not disposed to be too particular.

This is the land of the free, and the home of the brave. But the celestials hav made a little too free with our portion of this terrestial globe. We hav allowed our land to be the dumping-ground for the offscourings of Europe and Asia long enough. The Chinese must go. "No goodee, all welly badee."

Boulder Creek, Cal., May 21st, 22d, 23d.—W. S. and C. C. Rodgers are the chief standard-bearers of Liberalism in this thriving little place. I met many good Liberals; in fact, I did not meet one intelligent person who was orthodox. The lectures were well attended, and created quite a furore of excitement. I had a pleasant home with C. C. Rodgers, a gentleman of culture and a representativ Liberal.

San Francisco, Cal., May 24th.—Of course I shall be denounced by the "defender of this coast" for the vile, infamous, jaundiced prejudice that prompts the assertion, but I make it just the same—it did not seem to me that San Francisco far excelled New York in size, number of inhabitants, width and beauty of its streets, the grandeur of its business buildings, the comfort and elegance of its theaters, or the greater prosperity of its wage-workers. San Francisco makes a New Yorker tired; it is hilly, it is an everlasting climb to get anywhere; true, they hav cable-cars, but being hauled up or let down inclined planes well-nigh perpendicular is not sedativ to elderly persons of nervous temperament.

San Francisco is in a state of transition from the old grub state of primitiv expediency to the gorgeous butterfly era of wonderful success. Thrift, enterprise, progress, is evinced on every side, and yet let none who are making ends meet while living in any degree of comfort elsewhere, and still less those who by thrift and economy are able to liv and lay by even $5 a year, think to improve their condition by going to San Francisco. I speak now of the wage-worker. San Francisco is no place for poor men. It costs more to liv than in New York, and there is no gold to be had for picking it up in the streets. In fact, it is one of the hardest of hard cities in which to pick up a living. While men of capital can find excellent opportunities for investment, those who depend on daily labor for their daily bread should shun San Francisco. Of course, I visited the office of Freethought and enjoyed a jolly visit with the "man with the badge-pin."

On Friday, May 25th, I bade farewell to San Francisco and steamed away for Tacoma on the good ship Umatilla. A better-officered vessel never floated—cusine, staterooms, service, everything, was A. No. 1. The Pacific Coast Steamship Company are as reasonable in their charges as they are liberal in their management. I enjoyed the four days of ocean very much, but the weather was very cold, and, despite every precaution, I caught severe cold each day.

Puget Sound; Tacoma to Olympia.—Leaving the good ship Umatilla at Tacoma, I had just time to hurry to the post-office for mail, and back to the dock to catch the Fleetwood, the lightning little steamer bound for Olympia.

I was seriously sick, and, consequently, not at all disposed to enthuse, or look on anything with favor, but I was amazed and delighted at the extent and wondrous beauty of Puget sound. It is the Thousand Islands of New York magnified a thousand times.

This Northern country is not sufficiently well known, hence has failed to be appreciated in the East. It has inexhaustible quantities of timber. I hav seen hundreds and hundreds of trees over two hundred feet high, straight as a ramrod, not over two feet in diameter at the butt, from which a liberty pole could be cut one hundred and fifty feet long of nearly exactly the same thickness the whole length.

Coal and iron are found in the mountains; salmon and other fish in the waters. The climate is very healthy; no need of irrigation; the one drawback is, perhaps, a surplus of moisture. The weather for the past month has been "smiles and tears"—rain and sunshine alternating a dozen times a day. But here there is never scorching heat or blizzard. This is destined to become the greatest manufacturing portion of the United States—iron, coal, wood, close together and in unlimited abundance. Preparations are already made for establishing immense steel-works, and Seattle will yet become the real empress city of the Pacific.

I arrived at Olympia at 8 P.M., suffering severely from raging fever—head and lungs filled with mucous, and severe inflammation in left side. Hastened to hotel and went at once to bed; spent the night in fighting for existence by means of cold water compresses on head, lungs, and side. I survived.

My appointments are: Washington Territory: Cathlamet, 10th, 11th, 12th; Skamokawa, 14th, 15th, 16th; Stella (to dedicate new Hall), 17th, 18th, 19th. Oregon: Portland, 21st, 22d, 23d; Canby, 24th, 25th, 26th; Silverton, 28th, 29th; Brownsville, 30th, 31st, August 1st; Coburg, 3d, 4th, 5th; Harrisburg, 7th, 8th, 9th; Corvallis, 11th, 12th. Coos county, Oregon, in the order in which J. Henry Schroeder shall appoint: Marshfield, Arago, Bandon, Dora, Empire City, Myrtle Point, 14th to 30th.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

THE OLD TESTAMENT PROPHETS.

It may not be generally known that "prophet" and "poet," if not exactly synonymous terms, were formerly and may even in the present day be applied to the same individual. A prophet is one who is supposed to see things invisible to the generality of mankind, and to foretell future events. If he commits his vision or foreknowledge to writing, he becomes a poet or composer. Any literary man may be a poet, but he is not necessarily a prophet—that is to say, a visionary, a crank, or a rhapsodist. He may be all these, and write nothing but empty and meaningless rodomontade, and be at the same time a very good average prophet!

All the various religions that hav influenced mankind since the birth of letters and of art hav been founded on the obscure sayings of poets and prophets. These, however, should not be held responsible for one thousandth part of the nonsensical doctrins and theories that hav been deduced from their writings and sayings. They wrote and spoke according to their lights, and in the infancy of language had to express nouns of quality by metaphors and figures of speech, to which their commentators and expounders gave the "human form divine," and thus produced a bewildering number of gods and goddesses. I hav already shown how the Hebrew idiom for mother-wit or common sense became transmuted into a devil. With the Greeks, zeus, or summer heat, in conjunction with era, or morning air, was transformed into the mighty god, the everlasting father. The first-born of this pair was Apollo, otherwise the sun; but whether heat originally produced the sun, or the sun produced heat, is not satisfactorily shown, either by the Greek or the Hebrew cosmogony, although they both incline to the first hypothesis. Pallas, the goddess of wisdom or mother-wit, although represented as a female, had herself no mother, being hatched from the brain of Jove himself! The poet who conceived so monstrous a theory could hav had but little respect for the fair sex. Pallas had her favorits among the males, as witness the crafty Ulysses, but she apparently lived and died an old maid, leaving no descendants, and that is the reason we are for the most part born fools. King Solomon, whose mother (Bathsheba) was certainly not remarkable for her wisdom, has left on record that he had found one wise man in a thousand, but not a single sensible woman, although he had tried to the full extent of that number.

The Hebrew cosmogonist managed to dispense with the female element altogether until he had planted Adam in the garden of Eden. Then he found it necessary to introduce a woman by some means or other, in order to bring his hypothetical history into accord with existing facts. The manufacture of Eve from one of her husband's ribs, taken from him whilst he slept, is a very clumsy affair, and not at all ingenious. Yet this story has given rise to a widely spread belief, not quite extinct even in the present day, that the anatomical structure of a man shows him to be one rib short on one side at least, though he who believes this must be short in some respects, even if it be not in the matter of ribs.

In the absence of anything like a reliable history, either heathen or Hebraic, it is idle to speculate on the probabilities as to whether the original progenitors of our race were of the male or female sex. On this point we are as ignorant as Topsy, who said, "'Spect I growed." We hav nothing to fall back upon but the Darwinian theory, that we were in the first place developed from the monkey, who was developed from the saurian, who was developed from the trilobite, who was somehow evolved from primeval slime.

It is a long stride, however, from the saurian to the poet, although the latter may be of the genus vatum irritabile, and write nothing but nonsense. Perhaps the Hebrew poets are the most nearly related to the saurian, or rather batrachian, order, for they are croakers rather than singers. Yet it is remarkable that the heathen poet, who had more learning and more wit, and was probably more respected by his contemporaries, has long lost his hold on the popular imagination, and is no longer considered as divinely inspired. On the other hand, the "Thus saith the Lord" of the Hebrew maniac is thundered from the modern pulpit as an unanswerable pronunciation of the divine will. In the orthodox church "God spake these words and said" is held as a sufficient warrant for setting apart one day out of every seven as a national holiday. For this we should hav reason to be thankful were it not for the overstrained "godliness" which forbids not only innocent amusements but also reasonable refreshment to the liberated slaves of counting-house and shop. To make things of themselvs good as unpalatable as possible to the multitude seems to be the chief aim of religious cranks.

But there are prophets of good as well as prophets of evil even among the countrymen of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Pope has shown us the parallel between Virgil and Isaiah in singing of a good time coming, although to judge by appearance that time has not yet arrived. The biographers of Jesus Christ exercised a great deal of ingenuity, and invented some gross improbabilities, in order to make those supposed prophecies fit in with his advent. That a virgin, i.e., a newly married one, should conceive and bring forth a son who should be esteemed (at least for a time) the god of the household, is not in itself a miraculous event. It occurs somewhere or other every day in the year. But such an event as is recorded in the New Testament never yet occurred, and never will. To utilize the passage, "Out of Egypt hav I called my son," it was necessary to invent the "massacre of innocents" and the "flight into Egypt," concerning the first of which history is altogether silent. "That the scripture might be fulfilled" Jesus (not unnaturally) asked for a drink when hanging on the cross, and for the same excellent reason gave up the ghost before the soldiers came to break his legs. Those who rest their faith on the supposed fulfilment of ancient prophecies hav a very shallow and rotten foundation indeed. The utterances of the Jewish prophets are so incoherent and meaningless that an ingenious commentator may make of them almost anything he chooses.

Outis.

Some Matters and Things.

The authorities down in Georgia hav just hung a preacher for murder. Since then he has appeared regularly in his old pulpit and preached the word of God.—Chicago Times.

This is a decided step forward in Underwood's Religion of the Future. It seems to us to be the long-needed means of "reforming the pulpit." It ought to be in frantic demand by the dear, loving, and down-burthened laymen who carry the load of church taxes and support the priests in their holy office. Of course the preachers would kick against any attempt to introduce new procedures that would interfere with their "soft thing." Fill the pulpits with dead preachers, and where would go the priestly office? Where would those in the flesh now go to? The Georgia plan would giv us a "free gospel"—no money, no plucking of geese by the priests. There is much to commend the new mode. The famous "pastoral visits"—a license for pampered carnality to call at men's homes at all hours and visit the sisters, till an evil has grown so stalwart as to appal thinking men of a high tone of virtue—would hav to be discontinued. The "carnal man, which is enmity with God," would be out of religion in the best possible manner. It would be swallowed up in the grave, and the crimes of "ministerial conduct" would go.

The other day a Jewish rabbi offered up a prayer from the sanctum which is located in the United States Senate.—Washington Post.

Well, this is something new! An Infidel acting as chaplain in the United States Senate! Of course, a Jew is an Infidel—he knows no Christ! Yet, let us try some other kind of prayer than the useless stuff that has been bought and paid for by the people's tax-money. The old God of the Jews is the same God they all pray to. The prayers that hav ascended to God almighty from the lips of hireling chaplains for nearly a hundred years in Congress hav all been wasted—no response. We want to try some other variety, seeing that the standard article is a failure.

Organization.

We notice that our Liberal contemporaries are busily engaged in discussing the value to Liberalism of organization. This is, we presume, preliminary to the Congress of the American Secular Union, and designed to affect the action of that body.

The general opinion seems to be that organization is a good thing. Another admitted fact is that the present organization has enemies in the ranks of Liberalism as well as among the mobs of the church. Why this is so, no one has said; but it appears to be because of differing opinions as to the best methods of extending Liberalism, aided perhaps by some personal jealousy among the Freethought orators and editors.

This difference and jealousy is lamentable, but not unnatural. Liberals are human and combativ. Each has decided opinions of his own, and holds to them tenaciously. Many, too, hav been trained in some church or other, and bring to Liberalism the church ideas and plans of work. Others recollect what most affected them in their growth from Christianity to common sense, and naturally enough think that such means—be it books, or lectures, or papers—is the most effectiv to increase the spread of Freethought.

But if we start from the ground in this matter, we must throw away our personal predilections. The first proposition to be considered is, that it is desirable to spread Freethought, to increase the number of persons who reject Christianity and look to science as their savior from worldly ills, to rescue those whom the tormenting dogmas of theology hav made miserable. This proposition will probably receive the unanimous assent of the Infidels of the country. Second. Organization of those already free is one of the chief and best means of accomplishing this. This will be assented to by nine-tenths of the Liberals of the country. Then follows the question of methods—that is, the methods for the national or general organization. Local organizations will choose and pursue their own methods. And it seems to us that the only answer to such a question is, that that method is best which does the most good and receives the most support. This can be determined only by experiment; and a glance at the past records of the Union will help materially in arriving at a decision. From the founding of the League at Philadelphia in 1876 till the Syracuse Congress, Mr. Francis E. Abbot was its presiding genius. He had secretaries to assist him. They all remained in Boston and did all their work from an office. Beyond the organization of a few local leagues—nearly all of which died from indifference—we do not recollect any work accomplished. After the Syracuse Congress the headquarters were in New York—first with Mr. Rawson as secretary, and then with Mr. Leland. The same plan of working from an office was pursued. Under Mr. Leland's administration a weekly paper was started. No organization ever had a more competent office secretary than Mr. Leland. He was bustling, tireless, shrewd, and made everyone his friend. Yet, with the aid of a paper, the League dwindled to practically nothing. The paper could not be sustained, and its engagements with its subscribers were filled by THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Leland received no pay for his services, and indeed the receipts of the League scarcely paid the office rent. No practical work was accomplished, and no persons were rescued from the church.

When Mr. Putnam was made secretary the Union gave him a salary, provided he could collect it. He began to hustle, and finding that the mountain had but little idea of coming to Mohammed, Mohammed went to the mountain. For three years the office of the secretary was on trains or in whatever town would giv the secretary a chance to address the citizens. Hundreds of lectures were delivered, thousands of new people reached, and hundreds of dollars' worth of books sold. Last year, at the request of the advocates of the office plan, Mr. Stevens consented to accept the secretaryship, and see if he could not by correspondence do the same work at less cost. The result does not justify the anticipations. In his Union article this week Mr. Stevens reports the receipts as less than one-half the running expenses. This is very discouraging, and is not the proper treatment of so able, earnest, and competent an officer as Mr. Stevens. If the Union is wanted at all, the secretary should be a great deal better supported.

This comparison of methods and results is the only scientific way of determining what course should be pursued in future. If the idea is to do something for Liberalism, then the hustling method seems to be the best and to win the most support. In fact, it seems to be the only way the Union can exist until the Liberals see fit to unite and close up the ranks.

As to the personality of the officers of the Union, it becomes us to say little. We may perhaps be one of the jealous editors heretofore mentioned. The present officers are as good and competent as any men we know; and no doubt there are others just as good who would be willing to replace them. But it would be unfair to Mr. Stevens not to giv his plans and methods a thorough trial. He is bearing the brunt of the battle, and is doing as well as he can with meager support.

The question for the next Congress to decide is whether the Liberals want a national organization at all or not. If they do, let them say so through the press and at the Congress; if not, let them say so also. It seems to us that the Union ought to be sustained, and sustained with sufficient liberality to enable its officers to interfere in all cases of oppression by the church, to test the constitutionality of blasphemy laws, to fight compulsory Sunday observance, and to inaugurate and direct public movements looking to the granting and enforcement of the Nine Demands. Then the secretary could go where his services were most needed, labor in every state, and make the Union a powerful opponent of the God-in-the-Constitution organization.

The Religion of Presidents.

The religious status of the two chief candidates for the office of president of there United States is defined in the appended remarks of the Mephistophelian Sun:

"We hav never before had two Presbyterians running against each other as competitors for the office of president of the United States. President Cleveland is a Presbyterian, the son of a Presbyterian minister, and General Harrison, who wants to be president in his place, is another Presbyterian who has risen to the rank of elder in the Presbyterian church. President Cleveland does not take the sacraments of his faith. General Harrison is in full communion of the saints, according to the requirements of the Presbyterian Confession.

"In the list of Republican presidents there has not yet been a Presbyterian. General Arthur was an Episcopalian. General Garfield a Campbellite, General Grant a Methodist, the fraudulent Hayes a Methodist, Andy Johnson a Methodist, and Abraham Lincoln a devout non-sectarian.

"The two Presbyterians who now stand as representativs of the two rival parties in the country are reported to be both firm adherents of the Calvinistic dogma, with modern improvements."

As either Mr. Cleveland or Mr. Harrison will undoubtedly be elected, the prospects for John Calvin's mathematical religion are good. Presbyterians will hav the call on the rival sects, though if the present incumbent be reëlected the Roman Catholics will not find themselvs any great distance out in the cold. In practice, Mr. Cleveland fluctuates between the religion of his father and the religion of votes.

It is no one's concern, however, what the religion of a candidate is, unless he shall offensivly proclaim his partisanship, or by his acts favor piety at the expense of public welfare. Mr. Cleveland's ostentatious participation in Roman Catholic ceremonies is a fair subject for criticism, and in case Mr. Harrison should be elected any attempt to take his Sunday-school class into the White House could be condemned without impertinence.

The Sun's assertion that Abraham Lincoln was a devout non-sectarian is only partly true. Lincoln was a non-sectarian because he was an Infidel of the Thomas Paine variety; but he was never "devout" in the common meaning of the word. He possessed reverence for his own conception of a supreme being, but Christianity had little of his respect, however kind he may hav been to individual Christians. It is just as well to be accurate in these matters even if one has to acknowledge that the best presidents this country ever had were Freethinkers. Washington, the Deist; Jefferson, the Materialist; Lincoln, Anti-Christian Deist—three magnificent men whose influence upon the politics and welfare of the country will outweigh a thousand psalm-singing Methodists and Presbyterians!

Mr. Harman's Defense.

In its issue of June 23d Lucifer reprints the article which the Christian conspirators against that paper chiefly rely upon to secure the imprisonment of the Messrs. Harman, and E. C. Walker, who was at the time of the original publication associate editor. Accompanying, and in the "deadly parallel column," is the thirty-eighth chapter of Genesis, printed for the purpose of showing that the letter of W. G. Markland is purity itself beside "holy writ."

The matter upon which our Western friends hav been held to answer to the United States court is a miscellaneous collection of physiological and moral philosophy and a funny story such as commercial travelers and other story-tellers relate to while away time and put themselvs and others in good humor. There is no vulgarity in it, though it is a little piquant, but nevertheless not without a point and moral. The other articles are the Markland letter mentioned, a letter from Mrs. Celia B. Whitehead to Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, and a letter from one of Mrs. Slenker's correspondents commenting upon an article by Albert Chavannes. In none of these are there any sentences which in our opinion would excite lustful thoughts "in the minds of those open to such influences, and into whose hands publications of this kind might fall." These are scattered through various issues of Lucifer. Mrs. Whitehead's letter is a protest against the use of contracepts and a plea for austerity of life. Mrs. Whitehead is an aged Christian lady, with a large heart, but her work is always for humanity's good as she sees it. The "comments on Chavannes's article, from Elmina's correspondent," are also an argument against the exercise of lust. It is not difficult to locate the writer, who is an estimable and pure person, for whom we entertain great respect for scholarly qualities. The letter of Mr. Markland we hav previously described as "a coarsely written and exclamatory denunciation of the abuse of marital rights." None of these articles would be printed in these columns, and neither would the thirty-eighth chapter of Genesis, and many other chapters and verses of the Bible. But, as we hav said a great many times, so long as the matter is not of that vile class of publications which are manifestly intended to inflame the passions, those who wish to print discussions upon social questions hav the same right to do so that others hav to print theological or heretical discussions. And alongside the thirty-eighth chapter of Genesis, "God's holy word," all of these indicted articles are models of refined and pure language. The story of Onan and Tamar and Judah cannot be paralleled for coarseness in any book of standard literature outside the one in which it appears.

The tu quoque argument, as the lawyers call it, rendered into colloquial English is, "You're another." It is barren of logic, but is on occasions a satisfactory measure for closing the mouths of opponents. Though the unindicted Bible may be the most obscene book in the world, it does not follow that other and indicted books may not be obnoxious to the charge. But it is a satisfaction to throw the filth of the scripture in the faces of its worshipers who are trying to suppress unbelief in the Bible by means of alleged obscenity. If these worshipers are sincere in their efforts for purity, why do they not by prosecutions force the churches to giv us a pure Bible? This defensiv act of Lucifer, therefore, is not only justifiable but conclusiv as against the Christians seeking its life.

Obscenity laws, as THE TRUTH SEEKER has frequently said, are necessary and right when enacted by state legislatures and enforced by the proper municipal officers. The national law, however, is not only cumbersome and tyrannical in its administration, but under it hav sprung up societies of private persons who hav taken upon themselvs the task of enforcing these statutes. This is not in accordance with American ideas. Prosecutions for obscenity should be taken out of the hands of these meddlers and put into the charge of the local authorities.

Another difficulty attending the prosecution of the obscenity laws is the delicate judgment required in deciding what properly comes under the statute. In old times the conversation and literature were very "broad," and naturally the works of genius that hav come down to our generation are broad. Such works are the Bible, Shakspere's poems and plays, Swift's works, Rabelais's works, the "Arabian Nights," and dozens of others, without which our literature would be much poorer. Again, certain people—narrow and starved in thought, dyspeptic, and fanatically pious—regard with professed horror objects to which educated and traveled people never giv a second thought. Such folks look upon art galleries as the devil's evangels, and the theater as a section of hell. If the law was interpreted by them, the world would be what a nunnery generally is not—a place of austere "virtue," as ridiculous as unpleasant. When once outside of the really obscene, it is impossible to draw the line; it has never been done, and we do not believe it ever can be. Like blasphemy, it is a question of geography, of social custom, of education—in short, of pure opinion.

Under any definition, though, short of the prudery of hypocrisy, we do not believe that the articles indicted in Lucifer can be called obscene. If they can be, how much more need there is to suppress the Bible is at once apparent on comparing the letter of Mr. Markland with the quotation Mr. Harman has given from the Bible.

The Christians and the Jews.

The Jewish journals of this city are slowly but surely growing angry at the effort of the churches to convert the Hebrews from the faith of their fathers to the newer delusion of Christianity. They declare it to be not only a useless and foolish effort, but a fraud from inception to result. The Hebrew-Christian church maintained by the influence of Howard Crosby, Dr. Deems, and others, is denounced roundly, and the pastor castigated with vigor. "Suppose," says the Jewish Messenger, "that a Protestant-Catholic church were organized in this city for the avowed purpose of converting poor Catholic children and foreign immigrants to Protestantism; that its founder preached publicly in the garb of a Catholic priest to illustrate Catholic superstitions, and that every sermon was full of invectiv against Catholicism! Such a church would not endure a month. It would be razed to the ground as a pest-house of dissension and bigotry!" This is putting it pretty strong, and we doubt if the Catholics would be allowed to destroy obnoxious property in the reckless manner described.

But the complaints of the Jews are not unreasonably made. The work of the conversionists, as they call the supporters of the Hebrew-Christian church, is not marked by good sense or honesty. An example illustrating the Christian methods is found in the Christian at Work, where two columns are used glorifying the conversionist here and abroad, and stating, among other absurd things, "that in the city of Kishenen fifty thousand Jews embraced Christianity in one year." As the whole Jewish population of that city is something under twenty-five thousand, a Hebrew gentleman called the attention of the editor of the paper to the palpable misstatement. The editor replied haughtily that he "would not pay attention to every Ingersollite who saw fit to call upon him;" and the readers of the Christian at Work who do not obtain information from reliable sources are still imagining that the power of the gospel has converted to Christianity in one year more than twice as many Jews as Kishenen has within its limits. No attention is paid to facts by these conversionists. The movement is boomed beyond the bounds of credibility, and the other side of the story can find no place to exhibit itself. Proofs that converts are purchased are pushed aside, and notwithstanding that but few Jews can ever be bought to embrace Christianity, the organization is kept up by false statements and at a large expense just as though it really accomplished something.

This puts the Jews in a false light. It classes them among the "heathen," and is a reproach to their fidelity to their ancestral religion. The Jews are clannish, and doggedly obstinate in their adherence to race peculiarities, and the attitude of the conversionists is considered by them to be an insult; and though they hav been slow to resent it, it must inevitably lead to a determined and activ opposition to the missionary work of the Christians. And this opposition may well begin by forcing an investigation into the results of Mr. Freshman's purchases of converts.

Editorial Notes.

"WHAT we need," said the Rev. Mr. Halsey at the Spring street Presbyterian church last Sunday, "is not more wealth, but more men of worth; not more victuals, but more virtue. To serve God is better than to hav a well-filled larder." Still, we cannot help thinking that if Mr. Halsey's congregation did not keep his larder well filled, his piety would be insufficient to keep him preaching to them.

SAM JONES the revivalist has a brother Joe. This brother is also a preacher of Christ and him crucified. The Atlanta, Ga., Constitution reports that great excitement now prevails in Laurens, S. C., caused by the elopement of the Rev. Joe Jones and Miss Bassie Farrow, of Cross Anchor, S. C. The couple were married, but the bride's mother threatens to shoot Mr. Jones if he comes again inside her house. Somehow or other the preachers are always in trouble over the ladies.

A STORY is told of Ex-Senator Thurman, Democratic candidate for vice-president, that will perhaps lose him some pious votes. The story goes that on one occasion at Newark, O., he seriously shocked three clergymen who called upon him to pay their respects. Having made a speech that day and being weary from his exertions, the senator had sent down to the hotel bar for a bottle of whisky. The only stand in his room was a very small one, on which was placed a large copy of the Bible, given to the hotel by the industrious members of the Young Men's Christian Association. The table was somewhat littered with stationery, and the bottle had been set down upon the Bible. The clergymen looked at the bottle, then at the book, then at one another, and then at the senator. They paid their respects in the most embarrassing manner and bowed themselvs out.

THE Rev. Sam Jones has distinct ideas on politics. The holy Sabbath calm of Detroit, Mich., was smashed on the first day of this week by these religious sentiments: "Now I'll tell you, I think we are running the last political combat on the lines we hav been running them on. It is between the Republicans and Democrats this contest, and it is the last race the Republicans will make in America. The Democrats are going in overwhelmingly. Four years from now we (the Prohibition element) will break up the solid South. The issue then will be God or no God, drunkenness or sobriety, Sabbath or no Sabbath, heaven or hell. That will be the issue. Then we will wipe up the ground with the Democratic party and let God rule America from that time on." This is cheering for the Democrats, but slightly discouraging to the Republicans and heretics. Colonel Ingersoll, who is both a Republican and a heretic, will probably seek the mercy-seat at once.

THE Roman Catholic church draws from the treasury of California something over $133,000 annually for the support of its institutions. Rumors of abuses in these institutions led to an investigation, beginning with the orphan asylum at San Rafael. The Argonaut sums up the result so far: "Five hundred boys, from four to fourteen years of age, without proper clothing and proper food; without fires or a warm meal from one year's end to another; with at best but occasional baths; deprived of undergarments and stockings; covered with vermin on their heads and bodies—vermin feeding upon ulcers and running sores; neglected in all their studies except that of the catechism; not properly attended in illness; not allowed to enjoy the unlimited freedom of the playground; allowed to die without information to the mother, and so carelessly buried that the grave is lost; not permitted a cup of pure, fresh, warm milk from the sixty milking cows from one year's end to another; putrid and stinking meat in limited quantities two days in the week and served cold; bread in limited quantities and of bad quality and never warm; disciplined by a drunken and brutal master with strap and buckle; knocked down and beaten, and one is dead; boys let loose in dormitories to the unutterable licentiousness of darkness; towels seldom washed and seldom changed; fed in the freedom of a riot in which the strongest steal and the weakest starve; stock, eggs, product of the dairy, the poultry-yard, and a farm of a thousand acres sent to market; one egg given each boy at Easter; priests and sisters at a separate table, served by a separate cook, from a separate larder, fat, snug, and sleek, well-dressed, well-fed, in good health, while the boys are weak, emaciated, wan, famished, and ragged."

SAYS a daily paper: "The Prohibitionist party makes far louder professions of religion than any other party that has candidates in the field. The recent ratification meeting of the party in the Metropolitan Opera House was like a religious revival meeting. The prayers were long, the hymns sacred, the speeches unctuous, and the platform was crowded with clergymen and pious women. Again, at the state convention in Syracuse, Wednesday's session was opened with a half hour's prayer-meeting, under the direction of a clergyman. The speeches were in the religious vein; the platform that was adopted opened with reverent sentiments, and one of the resolutions of the convention affectionately urged clergymen to preach Prohibition sermons from their pulpits in church." The Prohibition party in this state has allied itself with the God-in-the-Constitution party, and one of the first results of its success would be the constitutional disfranchisment of Freethinkers.

IN his speech at the Republican convention in Chicago Colonel Ingersoll spoke of the Democratic candidates as "dog-fennel Democrats." This expression has been the cause of much denunciation of the colonel by people who say "dog-fennel" is a poisonous and offensiv weed. Mr. J. K. Magie, a well-known TRUTH SEEKER correspondent, who was for many years an editor and Republican politician around Peoria, Ill., Colonel Ingersoll's former home, rises to explain. The expression, he says, arose in this way: When the Knights of the Golden Circle, the Copperhead organization which during the days of the war did all that was in its power to embarrass and obstruct the work of saving the Union, was at the hight of its activity, its members met in fields in and around sundry villages, where the weed dog-fennel grew in profusion. The Republicans and war Democrats in the region near Peoria and Canton characterized the members of this Copperhead organization as "Dog-fennel Rangers," and this became a well-known term for them in that part of the country. Mr. Magie thinks this characterization was in Colonel Ingersoll's mind, and that he meant to characterize the Democratic ticket as a Copperhead ticket, and not specially as a skunk-cabbage or poisonous weed ticket.

IN regard to Mr. Charles F. Caldwell, the alleged "Ingersoll of the West Virginia bar," who has been converted, and concerning whom we made public inquiry in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 26th, Mr. W. T. Dutton, of Elba, O., writes: "Mr. Caldwell, of Parkersburg, is a well-known lawyer of ability, and practices his profession at present. He joined the Methodist Episcopal church, South, last winter, and now preaches occasionally. As to his being 'known throughout the country as the "Ingersoll of the West Virginia bar," from his known Infidelity to the Christian religion,' Mr. Caldwell's own statement ought to settle that point. He says that he was a great admirer of Colonel Ingersoll, but never was an Infidel himself. His alleged fame in that line had not reached this place, which is not over thirty miles from Parkersburg, but people here knew of him as a lawyer and politician. In the last presidential campaign he was a Democrat until shortly before the election, when he suddenly changed his mind and became a Republican. People in a position to closely observe his career claim that policy, instead of principle, was the cause of these sudden changes. They claim he is an aspirant to the office of prosecuting attorney, and, in addition to the Republican votes, expects members of the church to which he belongs, who are all Democrats, to vote for him. I do not know whether this is the cause of his joining the church or not, but it looks suspicious, and policy governs a great many people. The intent of the paragraph from the Indianapolis News was to show the conversion of an intelligent Infidel to Christianity. The facts are different in this instance, and if orthodox lies, misrepresentations, and persecutions were as rare as such conversions, there would be no need of such an organization as the American Secular Union."

THE Manhattan Liberal Club came down from its intellectual stilts on Friday, the 29th ult., and sat on the floor and laughed at the concluding performance of the season. If it is permissible to say that the perfect had improved, Dr. Foote, Jr., should be congratulated upon the advance the club has made since he began to cater to the mental appetites of a most voracious and epicurean audience. Even the light food of music and mirth which ended the summer campaign was thoroughly artistic, and the critics will undoubtedly preserve their good nature till the club reassembles in September. The program of Friday evening was rendered by the following artists: Trio from "Attila," Edward and Mrs. Schultze and William Harper; Miss Nellie Edmunds sang, "O, hé Mama;" Susie Russell sang, "Best of All;" the boy violinist, young Conroy, gave De Beriot's Ninth Concerto; Bessie Gray sang, "Tell Her I Love Her So;" Owen Westford rendered one of his German character songs; Eugene Sanger evoked merriment in negro specialties; Mrs. Ed. Schultze sang, "The Angel's Serenade," with violin obligato by Mr. Schilling; Hattie Leonard played Chopin's "Scherzo;" William Harper sang Abt's "It Was Not Thus to Be;" two recitations were rendered by Julius Kahn; Edward Schultze sang, "My Heart is Thy Home," by Abt; the little artist, Conroy, gave "A Prayer," by H. Léonard, on the violin. The entertainment closed with a quartet from "Rigoletto" by Mr. and Mrs. Schultze, Susie Russell, and Mr. Harper. Every member, from first to last, was enthusiastically encored, and each artist cheerfully responded to the call. A vote of thanks to the manager of the entertainment, and especially to the artists, was unanimously given. A fine piano was kindly furnished by the popular maker, Sohmer. The club will reassemble some time in September, when we hope the editor of the Independent Pulpit, Mr. J. D. Shaw, will tell us about Infidelity in Texas.

PRESCOTT, ARIZ., June 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: A voice from the wilds of Arizona. Inclosed find twenty-five cents for an ALMANAC. I am an old government scout and hunter, and think your paper is one of the grandest, purest, and finest papers I ever read. And if those lying, wicked, sinful, and misleading priests and preachers would read it they would blush and cringe away from its fair presence. I cut out one of Mr. Heston's cartoons—that of Mrs. Lot's transformation—and stuck it on a tree, and it does the cattle as much good as Christianity has done the world. It's a pity we hav no such miracles nowadays. What a grand thing it would be to turn the Salvation Army into salt for the benefit of stock! Hurrah for Ingersoll, Putnam, Miss Gardener, and others! Down with hypocrisy and superstition! With many good wishes for future success and happiness to all Freethinkers, I am,

Yours, etc., C. L. MAURICE.

SANTA ANA, CAL., June 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am not a subscriber for your paper, but I hav been reading it for the last three years, and I think there is as much good, truthful reading in it as in any paper or book I ever read.

They hav just closed a seven weeks' camp-meeting here, and I, like a great many others, went to see and be seen. Well, the sisters got around me and asked me if I was saved, and as I believe in telling the truth, I informed them that I was not saved. Well, they wanted me to get saved. I informed them that I had no such thoughts as getting saved, and asked them to let me alone. But it was no go; they were determined to save me. So three or four of them got around me and prayed for me, and after they had prayed they asked me if I did not feel better. Of course I informed them that I felt better. Who would not feel good after having three or four handsome women hanging and laying on a fellow for an hour or so? The next operation, they wanted me to ask all the brethren to pray for me. Well, I did it; so there was a general praying for me. The camp-meeting is gone, but there are a good many of the brethren here yet, and sisters too. So I met one of the sisters yesterday, and she asked me how I was getting along. I informed her, not very well, so she wanted to know the cause. I informed her that I had no idea. "Well," she said, "you must hold something in your heart that God does not like; or eat or drink something, or maybe read something, that God does not like." I mentioned several state papers that I read. "Well," said the good lady, "I don't think that God would be offended at your reading a newspaper. Is that all you read?" "No," I said, "I read THE TRUTH SEEKER." "What," said the lady of God, "that nasty, Infidel paper? Don't read that lying, Infidel paper! Why," said the lady of God, "that paper is at war with all God's people! Why, it will say anything to turn souls from God!" I said: "I know THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Freethought, but it tells a great deal of truth;" and I mentioned Mrs. Packard's case, that I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER just as I heard her tell it herself. "Well," said the good lady, "you must not allow such stuff to enter your heart if you want to seek God."

G. W. FUSEN.

ST. HELENS, ORE., June 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Since writing you last week I hav given six lectures, two at Magars Landing and four here in St. Helens, all in Oregon. I had full houses every evening; also on Sunday, or the "Lord's day." Science and Freethought are gospel enough for these nativ Oregonians. Many of them, I think, hav never heard of the lost sheep of Israel or the wonderful miraculous conception from that overshadowing business, and hav never drunk the blood of Jesus or feasted upon his body, making cannibals of themselvs by following the mandates of some heaven-pilot. I admire this freedom from all religion, all fear of the wrath of God or the scarecrow of the devil and his home in the warm climate. I find as much integrity, honor, truth, and morality, with less penuriousness and pinch-a-dime-until-the-eagle-squeals littleness, as among Eastern people where they teach: "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord;" "The Lord loveth a willing giver," etc. I once asked a good, kind sister in the Lord what made the Christians charge me more for what I got of them, and "Jew" me down more for what they got of me, than other people. She frankly said she supposed they gave so much to the Lord in building churches, paying preachers' salaries, buying Bibles and sich, that it made them feel poor and hard up. I suggested that they probably tried to keep even by "skinning" the "world's people." Blessed be the name of the Lord!

I hav now been lecturing six weeks on this lower Columbia river. It is a magnificent river, being in many places two miles wide, and deep enough for ocean steamers and vessels for a hundred miles above the mouth; the islands and bottom lands along the river are overflowed during high water, so they are of but little use except for pasturing. The bluffs and hills are so high and steep, although good soil, that they are as yet but very little cultivated, but they are covered with the most magnificent forests in the world, nearly all evergreen, consisting of fir, cedar, spruce, and hemlock. Just think of trees 8, 10, 12 feet in diameter, and 250, 300, 350 feet in hight, and growing so close, and with so much down timber, that a man could hardly travel on foot five miles a day, and cattle cannot in many cases get through the woods at all. Think of it—here within 30 miles of Portland, a city of 50,000 to 60,000 people, one can get 320 acres of good land covered with the finest forest the world ever saw. The timber has often been estimated at 10,000,000 to 12,000,000 feet upon 160 acres, and is often sold at 25 cents per 1,000 in the tree; the tops and down trees are burnt up to get rid of them. It is considered worth $100 per acre to clear it up for farming. Then, it is generally very broken and hilly, but rich soil, with splendid springs and brooks everywhere. I hav seen the finest cherries, plums, prunes, berries, clover, and timothy, etc., I ever saw growing here. Pears that weigh two pounds are quite common. No corn, wheat, or melons are raised here, but fruit-raising, dairying, lumbering, and salmon-fishing are the occupations of this Columbia valley. But it is very thinly settled as yet. The towns below Portland are mere landings and logging camps, saw-mills and fishing towns. Everybody seems to liv easily and well; money plenty; wages high; good men getting from $40 to $100 and $120 per month and board—but they are so careless and free with their money that most of them lay up nothing. The thermometer never gets down to zero, nor up to 95°, but for four months in the winter it rains a slow, misty rain two-thirds of the time, making the roads impassable.

D. C. SEYMOUR.

INGERSOLL NOT FOR LIBERTY.

LEXINGTON, MO., June 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: On reading his Chicago speech Liberals must feel as the Philistines did when it was told them that their idol, Dagon, had fallen on his face. The great Liberal orator seems after all to be only tolerably Liberal, which is analogous to saying a woman is tolerably virtuous. As Carlyle would say, "how God must laugh" to hear the colonel praise the party that gave the negro freedom to labor and denies him freedom to exchange the products of his labor! European despots are determined on "saving the people from the baneful effects of too much liberty" politically; the colonel, on saving them from the baneful effects of too much liberty economically.

He favors one-sided "protection" because, as he says, under it "we hav become the richest nation on the globe." A drummer for a Chicago implement factory said two days ago, "We get $1,700 apiece for those machines, and but for 'protection' we would hav to sell them for $600." I had just come from a district where women were plowing and hoeing in the fields, and where they usually go barefooted from motivs of economy. The price of wheat there is fifty cents a bushel, or thirty-four hundred bushels to pay for a thresher.

The colonel says these producers of raw material are stupid, but he wants them forbidden to buy where their money will buy the most, in order to "protect" certain other industries conducted by those whom he says are "the most ingenious people who ever lived." I firmly believe with him that we are, and therefore see no need to rob one class for the benefit of another, aside from the moral questions involved. A servant of the "prince of peace" preaching war sermons from his pulpit; a preacher preaching from the text, "Blessed are the pure in heart," on Sundays and seducing the wives and daughters of his parishioners on weekdays; a "Liberal" orator praising liberty and denying liberty in exchanging what we produce, are all in the same mudhole. I hav read the economic contributions to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but do not consider the question one that ought to arise among those who call themselvs "Liberals."

Suppose that Congress were to pass laws equalizing tariff benefits. That is, the "protected" industries should share with their employees and the public; the former by a sliding scale of wages, the latter by reasonable prices. Then it would be much fairer. But if the laborers dare to ask for higher wages they can "go," like Chinamen. And as for the public—"the public be damned." GEO. WILSON.

NEOSHO, MO., June 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, neither am I in sympathy with its doctrin and views. One of my neighbors takes it, and he kindly givs me the privilege of perusing its columns. To-day he sends me No. 22, of Vol. XV, and calls my attention to the Joplin letter, which I read with care. I fail to detect anything new or grand in the writer's views, but simply a repetition of the Infidels' text which they would hiss in the ears of all Christians, crying: "Calvin, Servetus! Calvin, Servetus!" as though all Christians were John Calvin in person, and all parties who suffer wrong were indeed Servetuses. Their whole system and theory seems to be based on this text, as though all Christians were responsible for that act. The writer dwells principally on the question of Prohibition and American liberty. I did not read the letter of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and know nothing of its contents, but in regard to the principle of liberty allow me to say that liberty unrestricted is not liberty. The freedom of action must necessarily be restricted when it comes in contact with the rights and privileges of others. If the manufacture, sale, and use of spirituous liquors can be tolerated without endangering the rights and privileges of others, then this government has no right to meddle with it whatever, but facts hav demonstrated in so many cases that its use is detrimental to the welfare, happiness, and political privileges of others. I hav seen times in the little city of Joplin when it was hardly safe for a man, much less a lady, to pass the saloon doors, yet we are told that under the principles of our Liberal institutions the legislativ authorities hav no right to step between vice and virtue, safety and violence. If the perpetuity of this republic is to be maintained by the perpetuation of this nefarious business at the sacrifice of the comfort and happiness of the innocent, to say nothing of their political rights, then I say, Let it go down with the crash of nations that hav fallen before. I would like to ask the doctor if he would like to exchange the present condition of his little city of Joplin, where he dwells in ease and comparativ safety under the restrictions of civil law that hav curbed to a great extent whisky violence and beer-saloon vulgarities, and place it back in the moral condition of twelve years ago. I am glad that the church is the mother of Prohibition, and no minister can fulfill the obligations of his most sacred duty without raising his voice in opposition to this most detestable vice, the use of intoxicating liquors, and I hope to see the day when Prohibition will be stamped on every state constitution, and printed indelibly in the supreme law of this nation.

But we are told that Prohibition is a failure. Our opponents would be glad to make us think so, but we are not so easily deceived as that. Is the civil law a failure, because crime is committed? When the law denounces theft, because men do steal does that prove the law a failure? But all well-disposed citizens unite in one voice and say, Let the offender be punished; while in the case of Prohibition where it is adopted, all the combined influence and capital of the whisky ring is arrayed against it, and not unfrequently is the voice of the people and the press heard to cry out, Free whisky and unrestricted liberty! I am willing to admit that there are other grades of intemperance that prove very fatal in many cases. If I see proper to wear a vest or pair of pants so tight as to injure my health or destroy my life, I alone suffer the consequences. But if I am a habitual drunkard I deprive my family of my time, my money, and my duty as a father, to say nothing of the abuse my innocent wife and children receive at my hands, and the case is different. Thousands of like cases could be referred to, yet you tell me constitutional rights and the blessing of American liberty grant me the privilege.

The doctor has a great deal to say about the position alcohol holds in the universe. We don't dispute it. We believe whisky a good thing in its place, and in the language of "Brick" Pomeroy we say, "Hell is the place for it!"

J. H. OHLHAUSEN.

LONGMONT, COL., March 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: My respected mother—Georgiana Rice—being very busy, requested me to remit her subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for this year. I also concluded to get rid of a surplus idea or two, as I was afraid they might spoil if kept any longer.

My mind is in a great turmoil from the effects of wrestling with V. B. Denslow's articles that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER a short time ago. After reading said articles, I made a rough guess that he was aiming blows at Socialism, but afterward concluded that I must be mistaken, as he did not touch one single idea or theory of Socialism in all his deluge of talk. He made a grand mistake in heading his articles, "The Distribution of Wealth." He should hav written under the heading of, "The Ideas of a Slavemaster." I find it a very hard matter to reply to nothing, so will simply giv him a little advice; it will not cost him anything, and he is not obliged to accept it. The gentleman's intellect must hav undergone a terrible strain while engaged in that arduous task. My advice to him is that he had better take a good long sleep, to giv his brain a chance to recuperate—not too long; about twenty years would overcome the effects of that article. Though it might take a little longer time for him to get out of the narrow path he is walking in at the present time and get upon the broad platform of humanity—the platform that advocates the greatest good to the greatest number.

I am surprised to find that quite a number of so-called Liberals are giving out long-drawn howls about the subjects of discussion in THE TRUTH SEEKER. They are right in having their paper stopped, as they do not need it. They are like our orthodox who smile and purr as long as you stroke them the right way—change the motion, you are in for a fight immediately. They are Liberal to the extent of throwing rocks at a great, big nothing that some people dub God, and that is the beginning and ending of their Liberalism. They had better take what little of the article they hav left and put it in alcohol, or they will lose sight of it entirely.

Hoping that Heston will continue to furnish cartoons to THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as they are needed to help open the eyes of the people, I remain, Yours with fervent heat, A. H. BLACK.

WHISKY AND IMMORTALITY.

ADRIAN, MICH., June 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Good news for the imbiber of strong drink! A recent writer concerning Spiritualism says we take all habits contracted here on earth with us into the eternal future world, and the desire is immortal, and the whisky—spiritual—will be dispensed to the old soaks on their arrival into the future realms. I hav my doubts of whisky's immortality, but admit that its effect causes one to soar in imagination to happy prospects—or to oblivion in the ditch, or wherever one's footsteps may falter. What a boon to the old toper—free whisky eternally, and no expense, where he can revel in a befogged happy certainty of a renewal should conditions require it, and in spite of his Prohibitionist tormentors! Local option will be at a discount. What will the agitators do? The old fossils will be halted in their earthly vocation. The imbiber can stalk about with his meter full with impunity. Only think of it—free drinks, no license, no legal holidays, but one eternal bliss. Prosecuters and informers must go out of business, and the devotee to the allurements of fermented natural substances will hold the fort. And think that all this earthly solicitude and worry must avail nothing. Prohibitionists will be out of a job, local option will be of no account, and those tired souls who spent a lifetime here to no purpose will lead a forlorn existence.

Intemperance is to be deprecated in all things. Our physical health demands it. But I would rather see my favorit brother or my father intoxicated than to see my mother or sister smeared with cosmetics, or to realize that any dear one imbibes the fallacious doctrin held forth by our church pilots. It is more degrading to the human mind to entertain the superstitious dogmas that are daily forced upon our youth than to be under the influence of fermented products of nature. The latter are genuin; the former is a lie.

Drunkenness was handed down to us from remote ages. God's favorits reveled in drunken debauchery. All sorts of inhuman acts were performed under the influence of wine, and sanctioned by the Bible God. The man after God's own heart performed prodigies of immoral acts, yet his God sustained him in all his inhuman acts. To-day should the same scenes be enacted, the perpetrators would be imprisoned or hanged.

O. S. BARRETT.

ALEXANDRIA, ONT., June 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Are you not getting sick of the Spirit trash that infests your columns and, to say the least, takes up valuable room that might be better used? I confess to reading all of Mr. W. H. Burr's articles, but not in search of what this paper is advertised to seek—truth. The last twenty years I believe I hav read very nearly all that is Spiritualist, and I hav long ago lost all hopes of finding any truth issued from that source. But I read the stuff from sheer curiosity to see how far the impudence can be carried, and take notice of the success it meets with. To me there is but one wonder about the whole thing—it is the fact that men and women should possess sufficient knowledge and education to express these yarns in good language, and sometimes even decorate them with the attraction of good literary style, and yet be so obtuse and inconsistent as to be deceived by such stupid tricks of magic as all Spiritual séances hav proved to be. It is really amazing to read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 2d Mr. Burr's article entitled, "Two Light-Circle Séances." He givs a minute description of the triangular inclosure wherein this white magic is performed. Why is the inclosure triangular? If spirits really perform the writing and all the other tricks, why are all these ceremonies necessary?

Mr. Burr says: "Three chairs are placed side by side, closely in front of this dark curtain. Mr. Keeler selects two persons to sit with him. He takes his seat on the right-hand chair. A second curtain, eight or nine feet long, is now fastened at the end where Mr. Keeler sits. The other two sitters take the other two chairs. Mr. Keeler grasps the arm of the second sitter with both hands. The third sitter takes the right wrist of his companion with his left hand. His right arm is free, and in sight all the time. The second curtain is now drawn across the whole front, completely covering the three persons, except their heads and the right arm of the third one, which comes out through an arm-hole. The second curtain is fastened by hooks to the first around each sitter's neck. The flap of the first curtain is divided at intervals behind the heads of the sitters. The light is now turned partly down, but we can all see the features of the three sitters against the dark screen. All keep quiet for a few moments, while gentle music is played on a piano or music-box." Now, in such a position, what could not be expected? With the lights so turned down that people's features can barely be distinguished from a dark screen, who knows how many human rogues were prowling about on the shady side of this human wall—whether constructed of one trickster and two dupes, or two tricksters and one dupe, makes no material difference?

The only question worth considering is: Was Mr. Burr really deceived by the tricks performed in these light-circle séances! I fancy not. I always try to be charitable, but in this case justice forbids. Mr. Burr is decidedly not very wise, as perfect wisdom must be perfect honesty, but yet he is more roguish than foolish. Does Mr. Burr really believe that, had he been on hand and solidly grasped the intrusiv hand that so affected the feelings of his sensitiv aunt, it would hav vanished from his grasp? Does Mr. Burr believe that spirits could if they chose write on slates without the assistance of Mr. Keeler or any other magician? Not a bit of it. I guarantee he will never accept a bet on it.

Mr. Burr's insincerity is well attested in his quotation from a magician, viz.: "I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not hav believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances." After such a preliminary, expect no truth. Such an apology is a decided guarantee that a pack of lies is about to be palmed off for truth. To confess that forty-eight hours ago he himself would hav utterly refused to believe the story, and now to tell it himself in hope of being believed by somebody, seems to me the climax of impudence.

A great philosopher has said in regard to miracles: "Compare the possibility of the miracle with the possibility of its being a delusion; thence form your opinion, always accepting as the fact the most probable of the two miracles." Spiritualism judged in this manner would stand a poor show.

What can be Mr. Burr's object in attending these séances and reporting them in such a way as to giv them the look of importance, while the description of the circle unmistakably indicates a contemptible fraud?

The man that demands trust from a perfect stranger is generally considered as a fraud, and the one that allows himself to be deceived by such—a fool. What shall we call the man that performs miracles, but always leaves room for suspicion, and the one that believes him? If Uncle Tom Winter is still living, he can tell us the right name for both.

CHAS. LAPERCHE.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., June 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER having published some of my straggling thoughts on the social problem that were incidentally suggested by "Letters from Friends," I think it expedient that I should offer a brief explanation of my position on the prominent theories of social reform and human regeneration. Religious systems being the first in order, I will note the obvious fact that they are but outgrowths of ancient social philosophies that were intended to lead the human race from barbarism to civilization; and are suggestiv of a much higher civilization than priestcraft aspires to, or its dupes are capable of comprehending. Moreover, the fact that every nation that has made any progress toward civilization has an established religion, is indisputable evidence that religion is not an insuperable obstruction to human progress. Furthermore, religion has never been master or mistress of the situation, but has ever been the servil slave of a more potent power behind it, who is responsible for all the crimes that are charged to religion and the church. I think it is quite possible that the priesthood and clergy are frequently the dupes of more subtle knaves than themselvs. Statesmen, and other despoilers of the people, do not advocate and foster religion because they are specially religious themselvs, which they evidently are not, but because it is an important branch of their craft. Therefore, I think the emancipation of religion and the church from ignominious slavery to unjust principles, to ungodly mammon, will be more profitable and less difficult than to destroy them. We shall then see if the church has the magnanimity to giv up her vile dalliance with subtle serpents, and turn to the people whom she has ignominiously betrayed and delivered to the despoiler, bound head, hands, and feet.

It being obvious that we cannot reasonably hope for further progress toward a higher civilization through the agency of religion and the church, I think it expedient and advisable to cast about for some method or agent of social reform and human regeneration that has in it the promis of greater efficiency than either religion or science, especially a pseudo-science, is capable of.

Anarchism, as I understand it, is a social state in which every individual is a law unto himself, and does that which is right in his own eyes. That being obviously incompatible with the present moral and intellectual development of the human race, it cannot reasonably be thought of except as a possibility of a more or less distant future, when the human race are become so perfect, morally and intellectually, that they can be depended upon to practice just principles instinctivly and make no mistakes. Nevertheless, that being obviously the ne plus ultra of social reform and human regeneration, I shall fail to see the expediency or propriety of hanging people for advocating it. If doing so is a Christian principle, I shall prefer to be an Infidel, though not of the type of Barrett, and a few others whom it is inexpedient to further disgrace by special mention. I think they hav disgraced themselvs sufficiently to satisfy a reasonable desire.

Socialism, as I understand it, involves a universal brotherhood of the human race; and universal coöperation by all, for the mutual benefit of all—"owning nothing but possessed of all things." That will require organization and government that will govern equitably and favor none. A government that governs on that principle is necessarily despotic and paternal. Applied to the enforcement of Socialism, it should make every individual absolutely free from the domination of every other individual, and giv none any advantage over others on any pretense whatever. Therefore, Socialism should absolutely enforce and establish individuality, instead of destroying it, as the opponents of Socialism falsely pretend it will do. On the other hand, the opponents of Socialism virtually admit that ownership of wealth applied to great division of labor creates an interdependence that virtually compels those who labor to do so for others rather than for themselvs. "No man livs for himself, but every man livs for others." That will apply to none but those whose labor procures the means of living. If it does not annihilate individuality, I shall freely admit that a logical definition of the term is beyond the domain of my comprehension.

They further assert that "all honest men are working for other men." Which I shall find no good reason to dispute. "If a man works exclusivly for himself, he is a counterfeiter, or a forger, or a swindler, or a sneak-thief, or perchance a highwayman." Nevertheless, it appears to be the unanimous opinion among intelligent and fair-minded people that a man who requires others to labor for his enrichment, and compels them to do so when he can, is a thief, and no better than a highwayman. And ownership of wealth compels us all to do so, or be possessed of but precious little. Socialism requires no man to work for any but himself, and for those who are unable to labor, in anticipation that he may be in a like fix himself at some time, and will then desire others to work for him. The opponents of Socialism appear to regard that as the most objectionable feature in it.

J. A. TUTTLE.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., June 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 26, page 326, under the heading of, "The Woman Suffrage Question Settled," written by a man pretending to be a Liberal, if I am not mistaken, is an article on which I wish to offer a few remarks. First I will say that I think the heading of the article is as appropriate a criticism as any I can possibly make. After reading the article, having had my enthusiasm raised to a high pitch, casting my eye the second time at the heading, it evoked a laugh, which gave me some relief.

Yes, the question is now settled, and if you will suffer me to dictate, which no doubt you will do, as you are aware by the tone of said article that men, and only men, hav the proper authority to say what women should do, I say then to our small-brained sisters, viz., Miss Helen Gardener, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Aunt Elmina, Mrs. Severance, Miss Wixon, Mrs. Lake, and a host of others, to stop your silly gabble; stay at home; attend to multiplying and replenishing the earth; cook potatoes, dumplings, and hash, and occasionally yellow-legged chickens, for your husband, and feel thankful for the privilege of being permitted to do so. In confirmation of this being good advice, I refer you to the holy Bible as ancient proof, and also to friend Wilson and a few others of his caliber as modern proof. I hope those of the weaker sex will make a note of this and not again expose themselvs in claiming rights which only belong to men—who are possessed of brains sufficient to use them in a way to get them knocked out. Mr. Wilson says men will never for any length of time allow women to decide by vote when we shall make war. It seems to me that our brother has been taking lessons from St. Paul, who held woman in such high estimation as to request her to stay at home and learn of her husband, for it was a shame for her to speak in the church.

Again, dear sisters, please don't forget that our mother Eve somehow, probably for the want of brains, got her foot into the transgression business, whatever that happens to be, and enticed man to eat the apple, or a part of it at least, and that God in a fit of passion threw them topsy-turvy over the fence. And again recollect, man was made before woman, which of course givs him preference. I could refer you to many other texts that would show you that all along women hav been a disturbing element whenever they were allowed to hav any influence, but doubtless you are already convinced that you are not capable of voting, and so will make no further effort, lest you might change this glorious man-made government into a pandemonium.

Yes, the Womau Suffrage question is settled for all time, from the fact that there are a great number of the brainy male gender who are laboring under the influence of the same disease that St. Paul was addicted to who hav so decided. There are a few, I am sorry to say, of this vast multitude who claim to be Liberals. However, if that is any part of Liberalism my mind is so obtuse I am incapable of grasping the subject. But we must recollect that inasmuch as religion is a mental disease, many who are emerging out of that condition, although convalescent, are predisposed to an occasional set-back. Let us hope it was in one of those temporary spells that Brother Wilson penned his article. It is evident that there is much of good left in his make-up, for further on we see how sympathetic he becomes when coming in contact with a present or prospectiv mother. Doubtless he happened to think he once had a mother, and for that reason woman is entitled to at least a small portion of respect. However, they are not to endeavor to usurp any authority whatever, but must be obedient in all thiugs, for thus saith ancient and modern gospel.

A little further on he says: "Look at the skeleton of a man and of a woman. Nature has put her chief work and material on man's brain-case and the woman's pelvic bones." That settles it again. If nature has made man superior to woman, how foolish it is that poor, weak woman should think it possible to better her condition by voting, or making any effort to elevate her sex! Miss Gardener made a grand mistake when she visited that eminent doctor to seek information with regard to the brains of men and women. I being a man and having a right to advise, I would suggest to Miss Helen, the next trip she makes, to visit Mr. Wilson or some other man who understands anatomy and learn how nature has been so kind as to giv man the chief material of brains, and woman bones instead. That is a clincher, and settles it again.

I must not fail to giv our modern anatomist credit for saying that "women hav the natural right to dress as they please;" but had he been consistent with the tenor of his article he might hav added— "provided their husbands would allow them."

But he more than spoils this exhibition of forbearance by saying: "They ought also to be in the pulpit as preachers." There is in my estimation in this last sentence as much to be condemned as there is in saying that it is right to hang a man. For my life, I cannot conceive that we can put a man to a worse use than to hang him. He would be totally fit for nothing after the life was out of him. In like manner, a woman could hardly be put to a more unprofitable and degrading business than preaching. He seems to think the mild effort of preaching would not be detrimental to her reproductiv organs. Holy Moses! doesn't that take the linen off the under-shrubbery! Who ever would hav thought that Liberalism required pulpits filled with women, and that one of its chief works was to keep her in the capacity of a slave and to enforce on her the perilous task of bringing children into the world? I am taking a paper printed in Cincinnati called The Better Way, and I notice there is quite a discussion going on with our Spiritualist brethren on the subject of Christian Spiritualism. Maybe we would better get up something similar in THE TRUTH SEEKER, with the variation in name, for instance, Christian Liberalism, or Christian Infidelity. Now, to my way of thinking, Christianity and Liberalism will make as good a mixture as oil and water. We learn from the article that Mr. Wilson was once a member of the legislature, and while there, in the dual capacity of legislator and doctor tried the experiment of issuing out in homeopathic doses a limited suffrage to women. Think of such men as this being chosen to conduct the affairs of a free and independent government, as this is claimed to be. Our pseudo-brother would better go back to the church—in case he has left it—for in all probability he is better material for a doctor of divinity than for a doctor of woman's just claims to equality with her father, husband, and brother, which all true Liberals hav learned is justly due her. Farewell, Brother Wilson; I hope your future ideas may expand into a more robust Liberalism.

I should hav been pleased to make some remarks on Robert Gunther's unjust insinuations on our good old pioneer, Hacker, and Harman and Walker, who are battling for Freethought, and will be remembered by lovers of truth when such chronic grumblers as Gunther and O. S. Barrett and all they hav ever done for humanity will be sunk in oblivion. But this article has transcended proper limits, so, hoping for more harmony among professed Liberals, I close.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Land of Little People.

Far away, and yet so near us, lies a land where all day been,
Played beside its sparkling waters, danced along its meadows green,
Where the busy world we dwell in and its noises only seem Like the echo of a tempest or the shadow of a dream;
And it grows not old forever, sweet and young it is to-day—
'Tis the Land of Little People, where the happy children play.

And the things they know and see there are so wonderful and grand,
Things that wiser folks and older cannot know or understand:
In the woods they meet the fairies, find the giants in their caves,
See the palaces of cloudland and the mermen in the waves,
Know what all the birdies sing of, hear the secrets of the flowers—
For the Land of Little People is another world than ours.

Once 'twas ours; 'tis ours no longer, for when nursery time is o'er,
Through the Land of Little People we may wander nevermore,
But we hear their merry voices and we see them at their play,
And our own dark world grows brighter and we seem as young as they,
Roaming over shore and meadow, talking to the birds and flowers—
For the Land of Little People is a fairer world than ours.

A Trip to the Capital.

What is more enjoyable than to take a ride of about twenty-five miles on a beautiful day early in spring? My mother, brother, and his wife, and myself started early Tuesday morning for the capital of Oregon. We had a light buggy and a span of young horses. In our buggy was a nice lunch prepared by my mother, which we were to eat in a shady grove.

The capital of our state is Salem. It is situated about twenty-five miles southeast of our home, McMinnville, on the east side of the Willamette river. There was formerly only one way to reach Salem with a team from here, and that was to cross the river on a ferryboat; but now they hav built a large bridge across the river close to the city, and so we went that way.

The first town we passed through was Amity, a small but lively town, full of industrious and enthusiastic men. We then proceeded along the beautiful road which led to Bethel. The roads were a little dusty, but the winds favored us by blowing so that we escaped the greater part of the dust. After traveling about eight miles we reached Bethel, a little village containing a number of dwelling-houses and a large school-house. This is certainly a lovely place. It is situated on a hill which overlooks a large valley covered with green fields, spotted here and there with a town or village. Then came the pleasant ride over Bethel hills. When on the highest point we could look back and see the valley below, which was surely a lovely sight. We could see McCoy, a town about one mile and a half from Bethel, and Perrydale, another small town about two miles from McCoy.

We traveled on through Spring Valley, a beautiful place surrounded by hills, green to the very tops with early grain. After going about five miles we came to an old and dilapidated mill. This was once a pretty place, but now the mill is nearly rotted down, and little can be seen but the old wheel. Our horses were getting tired and we were all hungry, so we stopped here to eat our lunch. Never was a dinner enjoyed more. We spread our lunch on a log close by a running stream, and the water, dashing over the pretty rocks, sang us a sweet song as we ate.

After eating until we were more miserable than we were before dinner, we gathered up the remnants of our meal and made preparations to proceed on our journey. Just around the curve from where we were is a little village called Qeua. Although small, this is a pretty place, consisting of a number of dwelling-houses, one store, and a post-office. It is not close to any large town, so the inhabitants enjoy the solitude of a farmer's life.

As we drove along through the shady groves we amused ourselvs by joking and singing, for the crowd was lively and all in the humor for fun.

At last we reached Salem, and much to our pleasure, for we were beginning to tire from sitting so long in the buggy. But nevertheless we drove around town admiring the beautiful streets and yards, and during our excitement we almost forgot we were tired. We drove over to South Salem and out to the Odd Fellows' cemetery about one mile south of the city. After we got back to town our horses were tired, so we thought we would leave the rest of the city to see the next day. So we drove up-town till we reached the door of my aged grandmother. We were greeted with a hearty welcome by our friends there, and, after washing, dusting, and resting, we were invited in to a nice supper-table, at which we sat and ate heartily. That evening was spent in visiting with our friends, which we enjoyed very much.

The next morning we were chagrined to find it raining, but, as we were genuin Web-foots, we did not let rain stop us from looking around the city.

At 9 o'clock my brother and wife and myself went over to the public school to see the scholars march, but we got there too late, so we had to put it off till the next morning, saying we would try and be on hand the next time. We then took a walk around the city. We went down to the flouring mills, which are situated on the banks of the river. These mills are built of brick and are very large, grinding many thousand bushels of wheat every year.

We then thought we would like to go through the state house, so we started for it. This is a grand building costing some over $1,000,000.

We went up the long walk, and, after climbing stone steps till we were tired, we reached the door of this grand house. The kind janitor showed us around the building. We were taken into the senate chamber and the house of representativs. These are fine rooms, hung with pictures of our noted men. Washington's picture is the first to be seen on entering the door of the senate.

After looking around to our satisfaction, we thought we would like to take a drive, so, after having dinner, we got into the buggy and drove out to the insane asylum and penitentiary. Some of the inmates of the asylum had the scarlet fever, so we did not go in, but we went through the penitentiary.

Dear readers, if you could only see the dark cells and dungeons, with their bolted doors, your hearts would beat with pity for the men, however mean, who are compelled to stay within their walls.

From there we drove to the Indian school, which is located about five miles out of town, and would hav had a pleasant time had it not rained so hard. Providence didn't favor us one bit. Coming home my sister-in-law got very wet and cold, and was not very comfortable the rest of the evening. When we got to the school it was just out, and such a gang of little Indian boys I never beheld before. Indians are well enough in their place, but I don't think it is right to build fine school-houses in which to educate them, when so many of the poor white children are being raised without any education. There might be as many poor children gathered up in the streets of San Francisco, and even in their own city, and given the education which is now being given to the Indians, which would be a far greater benefit to the country.

That evening there was a Republican rally in the city, and we would hav attended, but the "good father," or rather the bad one, saw fit to make the rain to fall and the winds to blow almost to resemble a young hurricane. Our thoughts that evening were of our journey homeward the coming day, and we feared we would not hav a pleasant time if the rain continued to fall and the winds to blow.

Morning soon came. No sun could be seen to rise from behind the distant mountains, to fill the city with pleasant faces, but large black clouds floated through the sky, and seemed every minute to threaten a terrific storm. But ere the morning hours waned the sky grew lighter, and about 9 o'clock we started once more for the public school. We were on hand this time, and enjoyed very much the singing and marching of over four hundred scholars. We then went back to prepare for our journey home. After wrapping up sufficiently to keep out the rain and wind, we bade our friends adieu and took our departure. We were favored with a light rain instead of a storm on our way home. We could not eat our dinner by the little brook where we had two days before, but remained in the buggy to eat a small lunch which we had prepared.

We arrived home safe and sound; did not get very wet. After we were once more seated around a cheery fire, and began to talk over the good time we had had, we all declared, "There is no place like home."

Wagon Wheel Gap. Col.,
June 11, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: As I hav never written for the Children's Corner. I thought I would write. We liv in Monte Vista. Col., but I am at Wagon Wheel Gap now. It is a beautiful place here. I like to look at the Children's Corner and read the letters from little folks. Well, as this is my first letter, I would like to see it in print.

Your little Freethinker friend,
Millie Trueblood (aged eleven).

Grantfork, Ill., June 16, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: Please find inclosed $1 for the J. Hacker fund—fifty cents from my father, Anton J. Kraft, and fifty cents from me. I am glad to see that so many of the Children's Corner friends are liberal, and generous to old folk. I hope some of the admirers of the Children's Corner hav tried to help Mr. and Mrs. Casey. In nearly every number of the Children's Corner I read of some boy or girl having heard a Freethought lecture. I hav never been to a Freethought lecture. I hope soon to hear one, but I still envy those that hav heard one.

I must close now, or I might intrude on some of the valuable space of the Children's Corner. I remain, Your sincere friend,

Nicholas J. Kraft.

Brooklyn, N. Y.. June 18, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: I hav not seen many letters from Brooklyn, so I thought I would write. This is the second time I hav written to you. I am eleven years old, and I go to a public school and study geography, grammar, arithmetic, reading, spelling, and science. Last Decoration day I sprained my hip, and I hav been in bed ever since. I write this letter sitting up in bed, and my sister will copy it for me.

My father has taken The Truth Seeker for a good many years. I think the illustrations are very good, and I read the Children's Corner every week. I hav read the "Story Hour" and "Apples of Gold," and think they are nice books.

Hoping to see this in print, I remain,
Yours truly, Ralph Stout.

[We are sorry for dear Ralph in his trouble. We hope the pain will soon be gone and he will be able to run and play the same as before his hurt.—Ed. C. C.]

Prescott, Ariz., June 2, 1888.

Miss S. Wixon: Respected Friend of the Little Ones: I see so many interesting letters by our little ones that I thought I would let them know how gladly I read all their communications. But first let me tell them why I write this. I, too, hav some little ones, but living away out in the mountains, and seeing no one, you can't imagin with what joy your little letters are read and criticised by them. They would like to write, also, but then they say among themselvs, "Oh, pshaw! we don't know anything to write about only Indians and cattle, and I am sure that would not interest them." One thing they want to know is: Why, in the present time, there are no saints; there are a great many more Christians to-day than there were when Jesus was on earth, and in those days they were all saints. Why aren't there any saints now? And if Jesus died to save the world, why is there so much wrangling to save it again? Will you please tell me where in the Book of Munchausen or Gulliver Book (the Bible) it says that the world was damned again after Jesus died and saved it? If God is such a great being, it is funny that he wants so many agents as sky-boosters to do his work. We don't think he is much of a God anyway.

For fear I hav written too long, I will close this time, with many kind wishes for your future happiness and prosperity in your good works. C. L. Maurice.

[We shall all be pleased to hear from our little friends in Arizona. We would like to be told about the "big Indians," the handsome cattle, and the lofty mountains.—Ed. C. C.]

Use of Stilts.

In the large plains called "Llandees," in southwest France, the people use stilts as a matter of course. These plains are generally flooded, though not to a sufficient depth to enable people to get about in boats. The stilts are not held in the hands, like those we are accustomed to see, but are firmly strapped to the side of the leg. The person wearing them carries a long pole to balance himself, and aid him in walking. This pole has usually a cross-piece at one end, so that, by putting it at a slant on the ground behind him, the person on stilts can sit down on it and rest. It is a common occurrence in that country to see men and women sitting and knitting in this exalted position, while the sheep they are tending wander about the plain. They wear their stilts all day long, putting them on when they go out in the morning, and taking them off only when they return home at night.

Here and There.

Little girl: "Ma, was Adam the first human being?" Mother: "Yes, my dear." "Well, who shoved him in the baby carriage?"

"Ah, my son," said the minister, "I'm glad to see you in the Sunday-school at last. Is this your first Sunday?" "Yes, sir." "How do you like it?" "Oh, I guess I kin stand it until after the school treat."

A lady asked one of the children in her Sunday-school class, "What was the sin of the Pharisees?" "Eating camels, ma'am," was the reply. The little girl had read that the Pharisees "strained at gnats and swallowed camels."

Mrs. Ram is going to take a class in a Sunday-school. She told her niece, "I shall hear the children their cataplasms and instruct them in the three creeds, which, my dear, as the bishop said in his sermon the other day, are the Epistles' creed, the Lyceum, and the Farinaceous creed."

In Arkansas City there livs a sturdy six-year-old boy who has been repeatedly told by his mother that God watched his every action. This idea took deep hold on the boy's mind. One morning his little sister was playing with him out by the stable. "Say, Mamie," said he, "you go back to the house." "Don't want to." "Well, I want you to. It's bad enough to hav God allus taggin' roun' after me 'thout havin' you along, too."

Little Dot: "I don't like to stay in the house this way. What makes it rain so hard?" Omaha mamma: "So the grass can grow and the flowers come out, dear." "Does the angels send down all this wet just for the grass and flowers?" "I suppose so." "Well, what do they slosh it all over everything for? There isn't any flowers in the streets." "It can't be helped, I guess." "I guess maybe they is hired angels and is used to washing windows."

Sunday-school teacher: "Who was Job?" "A doctor, miss." Sunday-school teacher (astonished): "A doctor? Where do you find that?" Scholar: "Why, miss, you've been reading to us about his patients."—London Freethinker.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectively and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

That Badger Boy At Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF JOSHUA.

The teacher read of Joshua, the favorit fighting man of the Lord, when that boy James took a hand in, so to speak.

"The Lord went back on Mose, when he sent him up top of a mountain to die, didn't he, mum? 'Twarn't no fair shakes, seems to me, after Mose had done so much for the Lord."

"We hav passed Moses, James; the lesson is of Joshua."

"Yes'm. Josh was a slugger from Sluggerville, warn't he, mum?"

"I don't know what you mean, you horrid slangy boy, but you stop such talk."

"Yes'm. Is women the children of Gad, mum?"

"You inscrutable boy, what makes you ask that question?"

"'Cos they all like to gad about so."

"There, now you stop this minute. Much you know about it."

"Yes'm. Did God make a great big giant of Josh when he magnified him, mum?"

"Yes, he did, morally, you boy. But don't you call such great and holy men by familiar diminutivs, you little heathen."

"No'm. What's morally and dimitiv, mum?"

"Oh, I can't explain to you, you little monkey."

"No'm. Why didn't General Grant blow rams' horns 'fore Richmond, mum, same's Josh did 'fore Jericho? Wouldn't the forts tumbled, mum?"

"No, they wouldn't, you little wretch!"

"Why not, mum? Wasn't God on our side, and in with Grant?"

"You James Badger, you stop!"

"Yes'm. Wasn't Josh offle to kill everybody in Jericho, mum, 'cept the harlot? What's a harlot, mum?"

"No, he wasn't. God commanded him to." (Second query not answered.)

"God was offle fond of killin' folk s, wasn't he, mum?"

"They were wicked, you little wretch!"

"Yes'm. What's the matter of the harlot that Josh saved—warn't she wicked, mum?"

"She served the Lord by taking care of the spies. Now you shut up!"

"Yes'm. It was rough on the rooster that hid the boodle in his tent, and got slugged to death with stones, warn't it, mum?"

"No, it served him just right. But I hadn't ought to answer such slang."

"No'm. Josh was a holy terrer for blood, wasn't he, mum?"

"Shut up, you awful boy!"

"Yes'm. Would he hung Jeff Davis to a sour apple-tree, like he hung them five kings, mum?"

"Oh, I don't know what he would hav done; do stop, will you?"

"Yes'm. That was a big hand Josh had to buck against—thirty-one kings—warn't it, mum?"

"Do shut up, will you, boy?"

"Yes'm. I guess them kings was two-for-a-cent chumps, mum, or Josh couldn't got away with so many of 'em. He just hung 'em right and left, didn't he, mum?"

"He did according to the Lord, you boy!"

"Yes'm. Josh was a corker for takin' cities and kings, warn't he, mum? We'd ought to had him in the war, he'd a took the whole South in a week, wouldn't he, mum?"

"I don't know whether he would or not—yes, of course he would, you awful little heathen you!"

"Yes'm. That was corkin' magic, makin' the sun and moon stand still, warn't it, mum? It's a choker to swaller, ain't it?"

"You James Badger, you stop!"

"Yes'm. God pitched right in for Josh, and fit with hail-stones, big's watermelons, didn't he, mum?"

"Of course he did. Didn't I read it? What do you want to ask for?"

"Josh was the John L. Sullivan of them days, warn't he, mum? He knocked 'em all out."

"You heathen boy, don't you dare to mention that horrid man with Joshua!"

"Huh! Josh was the horridest, 'cos John don't slaughter folks; he only knocks 'em out, mum, or calls it a 'draw.'"

"You wretched, wicked, evil boy, do go home this minute!"

"No'm—don't. Who was the Gil gal that Josh went to see after the big fight, mum? Was she his mash?"

"Gilgal was a city, you wretch—or a country."

"Oh, Josh was a son of a gun——"

"You James Badger——"

"I mean son of a nun, warn't he, mum? Was there nuns in them days, mum?"

"He was the son of Nun, Moses's minister, you little wretch, you!"

"Oh, Mr. Nun, eh? What a funny name for a man! Them Sheneys was rats on fightin', warn't they, mum? And kept it up after Josh pegged out——"

"Now, you James Badger, you go right home——"

"No'm—don't. Did God fight with Cezar?"

"No, he didn't. Cæsar was not a man of God."

"Huh! but he got there all the same, mum!"

"Now you stop this instant, or I'll call the superintendent!"

"Yes'm—he'd just like to mash yer, mum—he'd——"

"Oh, you wretch!—mercy!—ouch!" In the scene that ensued, which broke up the séance of Joshua, that boy James skipped, the subsequent proceedings troubling him no more.

SI SLOKUM.

The Man With the Badge-Pin at a Spiritual Camp.

George Macdonald in San Francisco Freethought.

I hav often wished that I could enjoy the opportunities for observation afforded by travel to the senior editor of this paper. A high knoll, a streak of sunshine, and an artificial creek for irrigating purposes do not always arouse my enthusiasm or excite my poetic fancy, but I am an intense appreciator of natural beauties, and I think I could describe them with a glowing pen. If any reader of these lines has a glowing pen in his possession he may send it to this office, and I will take it out among the sand dunes some evening and see if I can get a rise out of it. I love to hold the mirror up to nature.

I may say that the view from the window of our office, while varied for an hour, is apt to repeat itself during the next sixty minutes. The cable-cars and the horse-cars which circulate about the premises retain the same appearance they presented six months ago, and the soldier from the quartermaster's department at the Presidio still drives the identical army mule that I learned to esteem when I first came to this city. I see the same quantity of girls in red dresses, and a slight increase in the number of red parasols. There is no change in the pigtails worn by our Asiatic citizens, and my desire to grab the same and giv the owners a merry swing through the air and far out into the Pacific has not abated. Inside the room a similar lack of diversity is noted; no change in the books, in the papers, or in the pictures—except Heston's; none in the till.

To those who might be inclined to censure me for frivolity the foregoing will explain why, a Sunday ago, I took a day off and went to the Spiritualists' camp-meeting by Lake Merritt in Oakland. To get to this camp-meeting the traveler from San Francisco takes a ferry-boat, which meets a train of cars half-way across the bay. The bottom of the bay on the Alameda county side is so near the surface that large boats can go no nearer than a mile and a half or two miles from the shore without touching it, and the quay projects about that distance into the water. The cars would not be profitable but for the boats, for the reason that, though they run through the heart of Oakland, and stop with a yank at half a dozen stations on the way, no fares are collected on them, and the Oaklander may ride all day, if he chooses, and half the night, and it will not cost him a cent. This fact is worth mentioning often, because it is the only instance I am familiar with where the people get the best of a railroad. To reach the camp-ground it is necessary to let go at Oak street, walk north a few blocks, east a short distance, and there you are. Or you may release your pull on the railroad company at Broadway station and take a weary-colored horse-car with the same result.

Lake Merritt is not a gigantic sheet of water. Leisurely exercise at the oars will propel a boat around it in half an hour, but it has a surprising number of boats on its surface. It is a gay aquatic merry-go-round, but lacks a hand-organ. A fiddler on a big steam-scow makes what noise he can. The wind here comes from the west. The sail-boats leave the float with their little booms over the starboard side—provided I know the significance of the word starboard—take a streak along the eastern shore, go about, and follow the western shore back to the float. Sometimes the boats blow over. In such cases the occupants may wade leisurely to the shore and enjoy a picnic under the trees, of which there are several varieties.

I arrived at the ground too early for the afternoon discourse, and too late to hear the remarks of the previous speaker. I was not alone, and we took a nicely painted blue row-boat and went out among the white wings. Our boat had no wings, but it got there similarly. In propelling the craft I had the able assistance of Mr. F. L. Browne, who finds his chief delight in setting the type of this journal. I could not help perceiving a disparity between Mr. Browne's style of rowing and my own, and I think it must hav attracted the attention of others. The diversity was pronounced in the "recover." Mine took the tops off the wavelets and landed them neatly in the lap of Mrs. Browne, who occupied the bow of the boat, while his oar cleared the waves by about a yard.

As we passed the camp-ground at great speed I caught a glimpse of the corporeal substance of Mr. George Chainey reclining picturesquely beneath a tree on the margin of the lake, perusing attentivly, and we trust with profit, a copy of Freethought. Later I met Mr. Chainey on the grounds. Time has lengthened his hair and silvered it a trifle, but his form is as stalwart as when I knew him years ago in the East. He was an iconoclast then. Now he is building, but he builds castles in the atmosphere. He believes that the air is full of spirits who can touch him, and that belief does not make him nervous, as it would me.

I looked about among the assembled Spiritualists for the long-haired men and short-haired women, but did not detect their presence. The only difference between them and the ordinary assemblage was the absence of the "rough" element, and the conspicuous amount of intelligence that their countenances displayed. As a general thing it is only necessary to nudge a Spiritualist to wake up a Freethinker.

The camp-ground is not without its bar, and here are dispensed such incendiary drinks as lemonade, sweet cider, and soda-water. Among the luxuries in the way of food were graham crackers, boiled eggs, and fruit. In these we indulged mildly, though somewhat expensivly.

Speaking was in progress in the large tent, whence issued the sound of the orator's voice, and also, occasionally, portions of the audience, who complained that the discourse made them tired. I listened to the last part of it, and heard with sympathetic ear the sigh of relief that made the tent flap when the speaker remarked, "In conclusion I will say."

I made the acquaintance of Mr. Glover, of Los Angeles, who offers to pay $50 admission to the grounds if the managers will let the other visitors in free instead of taxing them ten cents each. I heard Mr. Glover say, in conversation with another man, that he had seen copies of this journal and did not think much of it. I should like to hav Mr. Glover call at this office. I am sure I could convince him of my soundness on the spiritual question, but after what he said I am afraid I could not agree to let him hav the paper for less than the top rates.

My friend Mr. Kline, from Sunol, has done what he could to Liberalize the camp-meeting. He purchased a copy of the North American Review for June, and requested that some one read Ingersoll's reply to Mr. Gladstone from the platform in the big tent. He said everybody in the audience certainly wanted to know what the colonel had said, and his method would save them four bits apiece. The managers did not adopt this philanthropic plan with anything like a rush, and the matter was permitted to lapse. Mr. Kline, however, carried over a hundred copies of Freethought and gave them away ere he rested from his labors.

I noticed many tents where people in the medium business were giving sittings at $2 per sit. I did not apply for a sit, because I am of the opinion that when any citizen of the future state desires to communicate with me the message will be marked paid at the other end, or that I shall at least be notified of its arrival. I am waiting by the river.

What I saw of the proceedings gave me the impression that I was at church. Services open with a hymn. The speaker does not pray, but he invokes the infinit spirit of truth. This, I suppose, is to put the audience into what D. M. Bennett called a similar frame of mind. The congregation is dismissed with a benediction. The portions of the discourses I heard did not impress themselvs upon my memory. I could repeat or report scarcely a word of them. Like sermons, they lacked relation to things and facts as we know them, and had none of the associations that giv substance to ideas and fix them in the mind. I hav often wondered whether some discourses do not serve to empty the head of the information it previously contained rather than to fill it with great thoughts. On the other hand, it may be argued that not all minds are receptiv of moral and spiritual truth. It is this two-sided aspect of the case that makes me cautious about expressing an opinion. I do not hesitate to say, however, that the visitor to the Spiritualists' camp-meeting will enjoy himself if he has the necessary elements within him. Of what he sees and hears he must judge for himself. I do not regret the ten cents I invested in a ticket of admission to the grounds.

THE

FIELD-INGERSOLL

DISCUSSION.

FAITH OR AGNOSTICISM?

—o—

Two Letters from Dr. Field, D.D., editor of the Presbyterian Evangelist, to Colonel Ingersoll, and two Replies thereto. Dr. Field is one of the exceedingly few Christians who hav opposed Colonel Ingersoll kindly and courteously, and the Great Agnostic has used him accordingly. Dr. Field's arguments, however, are broken in pieces.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

A HEBREW VENDER OF THE LORD'S DELICACIES.

Even these of them ye may eat; the locust after his kind, and the bald locust after his kind, and the beetle after his kind, and the grasshopper after his kind.—Lev. xi, 22.

Gems of Thought.

MILLIONS of toilers who seek to drown their misery in the Lethe of intoxication are deprived of every healthier pastime: the magistrates of our wealthy cities rage with penal ordinances against the abettors of public amusements on the day when nine-tenths of our laborers find their only leisure for recreation. Poor factory children who would spend the holidays in the paradise of the green hills are lured into the baited trap of a Sabbath-school and bribed to memorize the stale twaddle of Hebrew ghost stories or the records of fictitious genealogies; but the offer to enlarge the educational sphere of our public schools by the introduction of a health primer would be scornfully rejected as an attempt to divert the attention of the pupils from more important topics.—Felix L. Oswald's Bible of Nature.

THE church never wanted disease to be under the control of man. Timothy Dwight, president of Yale College, preached a sermon against vaccination. His idea was that if God had decreed from all eternity that a certain man should die from the small-pox, it was a frightful sin to avoid and annul that decree by the trick of vaccination. Small-pox being regarded as one of the heaviest guns in the arsenal of heaven, to spike it was the hight of presumption. Plagues and pestilences were instrumentalities in the hands of God with which to gain the love and worship of mankind. To find a cure for disease was to take a weapon from the church.—Ingersoll.

"OUT of the strong came forth sweetness." Strength and sweetness, force and beauty, naturally go together. Persons possessed of solid parts and character alone afford the soil in which the flower of true loveliness is found to grow. Others may possess a show of amiability, but it is a charm that presently dissolves—a sweetness that soon palls upon the taste.—S. P. Herron.

MERCY! this great word renews all: as, eighteen centuries ago, men passed beyond legal formulas and prescriptions; as, under Virgil and Marcus Aurelius, refined sensibility and wide sympathies embraced beings who seemed forever banished out of the pale of society and law, Burns grows tender, and that sincerely, over a wounded hare, a mouse whose nest was upturned by his plow, a mountain daisy. Man, beast, or plant, is there so much difference? A mouse stores up, calculates, suffers, like a man:

"I doubt na, whiles, but thou may thieve;
What then? poor beastie, thou maun liv."

—M. Taine on Burns.

THEY [the Federal army] established the sublime truth that the superior are the just, the kind, the generous, the merciful—that the really superior are the protectors, the defenders, and the saviors of the oppressed, of the fallen, the unfortunate, the weak and helpless. They established that greatest of all truths that nothing is nobler than to labor and suffer for others.—Ingersoll.

CONSIDER again how impossible it is in numberless instances to determin whether the sense of a passage in the Bible should be taken literally or figuratively;—how common it is that there is nothing in the nature of the thing to determin the sense or meaning, but it must be gotten out as it can. Very wise men, even the ancient fathers, hav expounded things allegorically, when they should hav expounded them literally. Others expound things literally when they should understand them in allegory.—Shaftesbury.

NEXT winter a player . . . acted his part in a new comedy all covered with silver fringe, and . . . gave rise to that fashion. Upon which the brothers [the churches], consulting their father's will [the scriptures], to their great astonishment found these words: item, I charge and command my said three sons to wear no sort of silver fringe upon or about their said coats, etc.; with a penalty, in case of disobedience, too long here to insert. However, after some pause, the brother so often mentioned for his erudition, who was well skilled in criticisms, had found in a certain author, which he said should be nameless, that the same word which in the will is called fringe, does also signify a broomstick, and doubtless ought to hav the same interpretation in this paragraph. This another of the brothers disliked, because of that epithet silver, which could not, he humbly conceived, in propriety of speech be reasonably applied to a broomstick; but it was replied upon him that this epithet was understood in a mythological and allegorical sense. However, he objected again, why their father should forbid them to wear a broomstick on their coats, a caution that seemed unnatural and impertinent; upon which he was taken up short, as one that spoke irreverently of a mystery, which doubtless was very useful and significant, but ought not to be over-curiously pried into or nicely reasoned upon. And in short, their father's authority being now considerably sunk, this expedient was allowed to serve as a lawful dispensation for wearing their full proportion of silver fringe.—Swift.

THE other day an exhausted stranger dropped apparently dead in a Pittsburgh street. He was carried into a drug store, and slowly revived. PIOUS GAMBLING.—HOW THE FAITHFUL AMUSE THEMSELVS WHILE SERVING THE LORD.

Notes and Clippings.

Good news! The new rifle-making machine turns out 120 rifle-barrels per hour.

A party of Latter Day Saints took to killing each other near Wheeling, W. Va., last week. Five or six were stabbed, two fatally. Their latter day came sooner than they expected.

The northernmost railroad in the world is now building from the gulf of Bothnia to Lafoden, on the North sea, within the Arctic circle. The line is building by an English company to develop the iron in the Gellivera mountains. The English laborers bear the climate well, and the long winter nights are illumined by the aurora.

Since 1879 there has been in the South an increase of 15,000 new industries, 15,000 miles of railroad hav been built, while iron production has increased from 397,000 tons to 876,000 tons. The amount of coal mined has grown from 6,000,000 tons in 1880 to nearly 14,000,000 tons; cotton mills hav increased from 180 to 370; cottonseed oil mills from 40 to 150.

The Christian Leader (Universalist) says: "So small a heresy as holding, speculativly, the possibility of a second probation for such heathen as did not hav knowledg of Christ in the present life, is resented with unyielding wrath by a majority in every 'evangelical' sect. The rancor and rage with which these churches formerly regarded Universalism, and with which some of the weaker brethren still honor it, is transferred in pretty much all its bulk and baseness to the new enemy in their own camps. Why this particular heresy excites so much temper we are entirely at loss to discover. It is the most benevolent and reasonable of the whole family of heresies, and on the principles of equity should be visited with fewest stripes."

A custom observed by the population of the diocese of Lyons, France, early in May, is as follows: On the feast of the Finding of the Holy Cross, the farmers bring to mass bundles of pretty white crosses, called May Crosses. These crosses are blessed by the priests, and then, says a Catholic paper, "placed by the farmers in their corn-fields as testimonies of faith in the good God, who givs growth and increase to the crops, and bountiful harvests to the tillers of the soil."

Russia alone of the great powers exceeds the United States in population. Even Russia must soon be left far in the rear. On July 1, 1890, when the next national enumeration takes place, the United States will hav 67,000,000 inhabitants. It will hav 96,000,000 in the year 1900, and 124,000,000 in 1910. This computation is based on the average growth of the country during the century. Employing a like basis for Russia, that nation before 1910 will hav dropped to the second place, the United States taking the first.

Garibaldi's Memoirs are being translated into English. In them that great liberator of the Italian people from despotism says: "The priest is the real scourge of God in Italy. He keeps a cowardly government in the most humiliating degradation, and strengthens himself amidst the corruption and misery of the people. In France he urges that unhappy nation to war, and in Spain, worse still, he spurs on toward civil war the leading bands of fanatics and is spreading extermination everywhere."

The Chinese Weekly News, published in this city, is out for Harrison for president, though the editor's choice was Ingersoll, Sherman, or the editor of Harper's Weekly. Of the Chinese question Wong Chin Foo says: "The Chinamen of the United States, as a rule, want no more of their fellow countrymen here. Therefore those who are here would naturally prefer a man to be president of the United States who is opposed to their countrymen's coming into the United States. It is a very selfish motiv entirely, but nevertheless it is the feeling of the Chinese here."

Ever on the outlook for the newest bits of choice humor for our readers, we hav secured the following from a "Book of Etiquet" published by a well-known New York firm: "One word as to the influence of religion upon the character of the young girl. A religious course of training can alone impart to the feminin character that spirit of yielding gentleness which, in domestic, as in public life, is the basis of politeness. An irreligious woman is as much to be abhorred as a drunken woman; she is no longer fit to lead in society and to giv tone to its morals; she is not fit to be a mother; she is not a grace, but a blot on her sex."

In a lecture on "The Labor Problem from the Standpoint of an American Trades Unionist," recently delivered by A. C. Cameron at Chicago, occurs the passage: "An agency which could and should be used to spread the doctrin of peace and good will toward men, to plead the cause of the oppressed, and denounce the wrong, becomes the apologist of the oppressor; and men, misnamed clergymen, who can dilate by the hour on the beauties of nature, the glories of the stars, moral heroism, or anything and everything but the gospel of Christ, to which they are strangers, hav not the moral courage to denounce a wrong, of which the workingmen are the victims, and I leave my audience to judge the reason why. Is it any wonder, I ask, under such circumstances, that the influence of the church and the action of its mouthpieces are viewed with suspicion?"

Our pulpits are to a great extent mammonized, and many of their representativs too justly regarded as the pensioned enemies of labor. The charges and misstatements of the press are too frequently rehashed, and instead of the gospel of Jesus Christ and him crucified being preached, the audience is regaled with a tirade against labor organizations by men who are as ignorant of their objects as they evidently are of the master they profess to serve. During the late eight-hour struggle a reverend gentleman, since gone to his reward, took for his text, "The poor ye hav always with you," the burden of his sermon being that the man or class of men who undertook to change this state of affairs was simply trying to subvert the decrees of divine providence, and should expect its displeasure. This doctrin seemed very agreeable to his parishioners—he was pastor of a wealthy church—for a few weeks thereafter a handsome addition was made to his salary. —Inland Printer.

Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

The friends of morality and good order among the ancients frowned upon and believed it their duty to suppress this incestuous intimacy between the members of the celestial and terrestrial trinities, and made it a virtue and a part of their religion to testify and put themselves on record against it.

The laws of the earlier civilizations were very severe against this miscegenation by which hybrids were produced. There seemed to be a divine or natural penalty attached to such loose sensuality by inflicting a nondescript species as a burden and curse to society.

Piety would require as much fidelity, at least, in conduct between the human and superhuman, as between the human and infrahuman creatures of this nether world.

We have never been instructed, nor have we been aware of the fact, that the heavenly father, to whom we pray and whom we so love, is not a real relation, but is only a stepfather furnished to us by the pagan Chaldeans, the blessed Son a stepbrother contributed by the Egyptians, and the Holy Ghost received from the Greeks. Had it not been for the generosity of these old pagan countries we would have been without our Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. What a pitiable condition ours would have been! We would not have the supreme pleasure of spending hundreds of millions annually in their worship, and of pouring out our souls in gratitude and in honor of their names. How few of us know the delicacy of the situation, and the obligations we are under to our unknown heathen friends!

To manufacture, introduce, enforce, and establish this dogma of the trinity, was an expensive enterprise. The first battle fought among Christians was over this question, in which sixty-five thousand lives were lost. For three centuries it was the question that convulsed Europe with religious wars, which resulted in the destruction of the Roman empire, when the provinces and states, once under law and a firm government, lapsed into rival factions and contests to exterminate and destroy each other. Civilization returned to barbarism, which continued for a thousand years—a period known in history as the Dark Ages. The cost of this trinity has indeed been great enough to make it precious, and well may its devotees lavish on it unstinted devotion, unqualified eulogy, in tones of holy endearment and gratitude, as it is the only way to utter their feelings of thanks for the priceless blessing.

We claim to be an intelligent and enlightened people, and feel ourselves far superior to our heathen brethren from whom primarily we derived our religion; and in our serene confidence and self-complacency are not aware, nor do we desire or care to be, that we are acting over in a new name the same farce for which we commiserate the heathen. We look upon those who are not on the stage and performing with us with pity and sorrow, and are so sad for their Infidelity. Our priests and parsons lament over unbelievers and tell them how much they hav lost, and what a happiness and blessing there is in being a believer and actor.

The most unfortunate feature in all this drama is, that those engaged in it have their minds so poisoned and paralyzed, that for the masses there seems no hope of recovery from it. They are lost to the truth and beyond redemption.

Such is the blind and stupid infatuation wrought, that the vast multitude of otherwise comparatively good and honest people really and sincerely believe that it is not safe, if it is not impossible, to raise their children in uprightness of character and morality without the aid of these hoary errors and illusions of our pagan progenitors.

We read in the old literature what wonderful things have been achieved by them among men in the past, and they inspire in us such a reverential regard for their triumphant conquests that we dare not trust ourselves or others to attempt to live without their influence.

Jehovah was the tutelary deity, the national divinity, of the Jews. He was the local, temporary representative of a portion of that idolatrous people. He had the attributes, passions, and personalities corresponding with the condition of his worshipers. He never was the "unchangeable," the "incommunicable," the "everlasting to everlasting," of the prophets and wiser men among them. It was this Jehovistic deity of the Jews that our early creed-makers used as their heavenly father or the first person in their trinity. A deity of any higher character or greater pretensions would not have consented to act as partner in a firm to be composed of himself, the Ghost of the Greeks, and the Son of a virgin. But this is practically and historically the true origin of our "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost" trinity.

This story of the immaculate conception of a virgin and the birth of the Son of God was in the first place only a fancy picture, an ideal or allegory, of the imagination.

It was in that age the method used by the Greeks to express their highest thoughts and purest conceptions of excellence.

While it was used as a symbol, or metaphor, and understood in that sense, it did no harm in misleading or exciting to conflict of opinion.

It was not till lack of culture resulted from a trust in faith, and the mind became debased by a sensuous, material literalism, that these metaphors and fables were taken for objective realities. Then the sensuous, bigoted bishops could not see and understand alike about the elements and construction of this personality which they had formulated and constituted into a "Son of God" for the purpose of completing their Christian trinity.

We may be asked, Why this exposure, this irreverent trifling with the divine secrets and holy personalities of the godhead? Why handle with profane hands these emblems of our faith, these sacred representations, so adorable and precious to the heart of every sincere Christian? We answer: Because you ought to know—everyone ought to know, the truth, the facts, in relation to the origin and history of his religion. The truth is right, and it is good for us to know it on every other subject that concerns us. We would despise the man as a fraud who purposely kept us in the dark and deceived us to our injury or ruin in the temporal affairs of life; and he who deceives us in regard to our spiritual, is no less a fraud, and should be equally exposed, and reformed if possible. For his guilt is greater than that of the man who does not deceive in the name of God.

To build up a religion out of fragments of pagan superstitions, that is well known to have no other foundation or origin, and to enforce it on the ignorant, by terrific appeals and threats, as the only terms of the soul's salvation, is to frighten men into falsehoods to their lifelong injury. It is to enslave and debauch their moral natures, to crush the spirit of inquiry, and to forbid in the name of religion all further search after truth. It puts faith in the creed above honesty, justice, or knowledge; it makes man a slave, a tool, a fool, on earth, that he may enjoy the future this heathen creed pretends to provide for him.

Give us the truth; don't feed us on falsehood. Remember, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

We would never have had a heavenly father had not the star-gazing, sun-worshiping Chaldean idolators captured and held in slavery the Jewish nation for seventy years, compelling them to abandon the worship of their Jehovah, and to adopt the worship of their own "father in the sky." We never would have had a Holy Ghost if Greek mythology had not furnished it from their belief in innumerable ghosts or demons, nor a Son of God had not the Greeks and Egyptians, after centuries of angry controversy about it, compromised on him and allowed or forced it in the Christian creed in the fourth century of the Christian era, so called.

Every theologian or layman that has read the Catholic orthodox and only history of the church and of Christianity, knows these are the substantial lessons of history, and there is no escape from it.

As pagan, absurd, and ridiculous as is this story, compounded from ancient heathenism, it has been forced and fought and frightened, cajoled and coaxed, into millions of the human race for fifty generations, till it has expanded the organs or portions of the brain through which marvelousness, fear, reverence, and credulity are manifested, and these, morbidly developed in us, are so eager for gratification that they seize with avidity on these crude conceptions for their gratification. Such is the hunger and longing for the ghostly, the supernatural, or unearthly, that multitudes feel life is a failure, and this world but a dark and dreary blank, if it is not the vestibule to that abode occupied by the "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," and other celestials, in ecstatic bliss, through all eternity. But what mischief these illusions and impositions have wrought; and how they are crushing out all true manhood from millions of the ignorant masses to-day!

If any reliance can be placed on the testimony of the unknown writers of the gospels and other books of the New Testament now after the late revisers have found and left uncorrected the many errors and misrepresentations that abound in it, neither Joshua the Son of Mary, nor Paul his chief disciple, believed in any part of this trinity. They both did, as many sensible people do now, in speaking on superstitious questions and discussing subjects with believers, use the popular phraseology, but construed it into a rational or practical meaning. They both plucked the kingdom of heaven and the heavenly Father from among the stars and planted them in and among men. Joshua, now Jesus, says, "The kingdom of heaven is within you," "The kingdom of heaven is at hand." He impressed that in numerous parables. When asked by his disciple Philip to show or tell what he meant by "the Father," he used his own personal experience to explain it. "He who has seen me has seen the Father. I am in him and he in me" He also said, "God is light," "God is love." He knew he had some light and some love in himself, therefore God was in him.

Paul is made to avow the same ideas when he says, "Ye are the temple of God," "Ye are the temple of the Holy Ghost."

The burden of these teachers among their superstitious brethren was to bring their thoughts and devotions away from any "Heavenly Father," or "Holy Ghost," or "Son of God," save those that were ever present within men, in the form of light, intelligence, love, truth, honesty, and fair dealing with each other.

When we find views that appear to conflict with these, the revisers tell us they are perversions or corruptions by copyists or translators, or they intimate it may be so suspected.

While the vulgar really believed literally in these imaginary personalities called Sons of God as beings in dangerous proximity, against whom it was their duty to protect themselves, the intelligent thinkers, the rational class, had no such belief. Paul aimed to simplify the thought, and disabuse his disciples of these heathen conceptions.

In Romans viii, 14, he says: "For as many as are led by the spirit of good, or God, they are the Sons of good." The text represents Paul as pressing these rational and human ideas of what constitutes a Son of God in his various epistles to the barbarian mythologists of his age.

There is evidence in the gospels that their authors also held the same sensible views; for the early Greek copies were clear of the heathen corruptions that pervaded the later copies from which our English translation was made. So the late revisers tell us.

The magian or Persian and Asiatic Christians made the "Son of God" a mere phantom of the imagination, which they used as a metaphor in expounding their incomprehensible metaphysical abstractions.

European Christians have taken all these diverse views and woven them into a web of mysteries which it literally defies the human intellect to grasp, or to attempt to unravel.

We stultify ourselves, put out our intellectual eyes, reverence our credulity, and stand aghast with admiration at the wonderful mysteries through which we have been introduced to a knowledge of a triune godhead, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, through whom we are provided for in life, and secured after death an inheritance of eternal misery or blessedness, somewhere in the regions of space.

The text of the representative teachers, the leading characters in the New Testament, seems to show that they meant to make rational and practical these popular heathen ideas of the trinity. For they insisted that the "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost" was in man. While they used the pagan language, the terms and phraseology in speaking to these trinitarians then, they gave the words or names a new definition. They were not divinities or dæmons somewhere in space, who would play high carnival with men at pleasure. But they were merely personifications of our inherent moral qualities.

Now we know that all of this triune divinity that can be put into a man and kept there cannot justly be entitled to much reverence nor to recognition as anything supernatural or worthy of notice.

It is the revival and reproduction of these old pagan notions, and an utter disregard of the sensible use and application given them by the earlier disciples of the simple lessons of Joshua, that orthodox Christianity from the days of Constantine up to the present has insisted we should all accept. It was the clinging to the old pagan notions that were to make us saints and insure our eternal happiness, and not the repudiation of them, as taught by Joshua and Paul and James, that constituted a Christian in the sense of the mistaken church. On the other hand, a real Christian was one who abandoned all these mythological illusions and pagan follies, and turned his attention to acquiring correct ideas of life and living up to them in practice and conduct with his fellows.

The Infidels—so called—the honest, intelligent Liberals of to-day, are one in mind and heart with the practical teachings and rational definitions given to this ancient superstition and phraseology of the Jews.

They are in reality the only true disciples and believers in these sensible ideas as explained by the ancient teachers; and their so-called orthodox opponents are the unbelievers and infidels.

The latter prefer and have allied themselves with the pagan Greeks' or Egyptian creed, constructed by Constantine and Athanasius and their adherents in the fourth century. Millions of orthodox, and unorthodox also, prefer, in full or in part, the language and sentiments contained in that creed, and in the ancient and modern literature devoted to expounding, modifying, and interpreting it to favor their own particular form or degree of religious belief.

Our religious literature is permeated with this trinitarian faith and language, and the children are plied with it from infancy to mature life. Parents and pious teachers who would profess to scorn, and feel it a dreadful sin, to lie, or to deceive and mislead their children in regard to their conduct and duties toward one another, or in respect to the truth of the terrifying superstitions of the heathen and their lost condition, have no scruples or hesitation, but feel it a great privilege and delight, as well as solemn duty, to deceive the young and impose upon them this same heathenism, in the most pathetic, tender, and reverential tones, and believe it an essential and saving virtue to do so. "Our heavenly Father," "his dear Son," and "the Holy Spirit," are the same to us and as precious as the trinities of the pagans, from whom we derived ours, are to them; nor can ours possibly be any better or more real than theirs.

The different ideas attached to the word chod, good, or god, in the different languages or nationalities, and by those of the same nation of different degrees of culture and intelligence, have led to great confusion and uncertainty.

Our English language and ideas being a composition, a complex, or compound of words representing heterogeneous beliefs, interpretations, and faiths, from philosophic Rationalism down to the most groveling idolatry, gross superstition, and sensuous mythology, it taxed the ingenuity, the imagination, and literary skill of the translators to work all this conflicting, incoherent, and discordant material into a connected system or narration that would commend itself to the admiration and confidence of the reader. Our scriptures furnish us an example of the success they made, and to what the human mind has yielded its assent.

While our Bible continues as our text-book, in its present old style of composition, pervaded as it is with personalities, parables, fictions, and fable, making it in many places but a reflex of Greek mythology; and it is urged upon us as a holy book, a divine inspiration, and the "Word of God," the masses must remain in bondage, their minds shut out from that light and intelligence which alone can liberate them. They must remain the willing victims of falsehoods and delusions, which will blast their hopes, defeat their prospects, and compel them to remain the servile dependants of those who mislead and degrade them. Give us light and liberty! Give us the truth, which alone can make us free!

Philadelphia, April, 1888. T. E. LONGSHORE.

Why Are They Tolerated?

Let us consider the work of Christian ministers. Not what they are trying to do, not what they are talking of doing, not what they hope to do, or by what means they expect to do it; but what they do, and what they hav done.

Suppose we were to hold them accountable for the transgressions of their ministerial forefathers, as they tell us God is going to hold us responsible for sins committed hundreds of years ago, then for how many profligacies, debaucheries, murders, unjust persecutions, crimes, and indecencies of all kinds would these devout men hav to answer? But let us be as charitable as we can toward them; let us be more just than they say is God.

We will consider the present generation of preachers on their own merits and demerits, for what they are worth. Are they any better than their predecessors? Are they necessary? and, if not, why are they tolerated? We must admit that they hav generally ceased to burn, to persecute, to murder those who happen to differ from them in their opinions, and are honest enough to tell them so; but how much credit are we to giv them for this? They are now content to hav God do the dirty work for them, simply because they hav not the power to do it themselvs. Men who say, "Believe as I do or be damned; think as I do or burn," would only be too glad to apply the torch themselvs if they dared.

In the little village where I now write, there are two congregations, a Methodist and a Presbyterian. Both churches hav not more than fifty or sixty members, yet each supports a parson. It is most conclusivly evident that they hate each other worse than they hate sin.

I hav conversed freely with most of them on the subject of religion. Not one in ten knows the creed he "believes," or can tell why he is a member of the church to which he belongs in preference to any other. These simple-minded, well-meaning people are the dupes of the preachers. Sectarianism is a very clever scheme to increase the demand for parsons. One man could preach morality to four times the whole number of persons in the village with far better effect than to the few who belong to his own sect, yet the little hamlet is made to support two of the drones.

I say we could dispense with both, for why do we need them? Hav we not teachers in our schools whose duty it is to teach—to preach morality as well as to teach books? Ah! we need them to teach religion, they say. They should say, to foster superstition. They virtually admit that if they did not support drones whose only business was to invent tales of terror, they would eventually cease to be superstitious, i. e., religious. Besides, we need them to guard the good morals of the community, say the dupes.

Take up any newspaper and read of a few cases of gross immorality. The chances are that a few of the incidents may be the work of some ignorant outlaw; many of them will be accounts of the crimes of clerical sharks. But let us admit, for the sake of argument, that the average morality of priests is as good as that of other people who pretend to be respectable—and clerical cheek itself surely could not ask us to be more liberal than this—then is this sufficient? Ought we not to expect much more of them than we expect of other people? If there be any truth in what they say, any virtue in what they profess to believe, any answer to prayer, why, then, are not their lives above reproach?

You say the lives of many of them are. Yes, no doubt; but when you get a preacher you hav a risk to run. He has opportunities for insinuating himself into your families, and, clothed in the garb of hypocrisy, for interfering with your domestic happiness—opportunities which others do not hav. And it is most notoriously true that many of them hav taken, and do continue to take, advantage of the opportunities which their idolatrous craft presents them.

Consider the harm they do. Some of them do a little good occasionally, to be sure. I hope there never lived a man so mean that he never did a little good at some period of his life. But many of them will tell you, we cannot do any good thing of ourselvs. If so, why are we entitled to any credit or reward, or punishment?

But admitting that we are free agents to do good or evil, then would not parsons hav the same right to do, the same privilege of doing good, if they were honest mechanics or laborers, as they hav as parsons? Could not any man do better earning money to educate the heathen, if they must be educated, than by begging it, as well as his own livelihood? They are not entitled to credit for what they do, but for the motivs which prompt them to do it. They are not entitled to credit for the good they do as men, for we all enjoy the blessed privilege of doing good; but as preachers they are entitled to credit or discredit for the motivs which prompt them to do what they do as preachers, which other men could not or would not do as men.

It is mere twaddle to assert that men do not prepare to preach from the same motivs which prompt men to follow other professions. It affords lazy, little-minded fellows an easy means of subsisting at the expense of ignorance and superstition. And men who could not expect to make respectable failures as anything else, may very reasonably hope to liv in luxury and idleness, as priests.

"He is a very good man, though a very poor preacher," is about all most small congregations can say for their parsons. Then what do they keep them for? Hav not the priests a right to be decent, law-abiding citizens—which many of them are not—whether they preach or not? If your minister can not produce an original idea at least once in six months, why not discharge the good man, and thereby assist him to be a better man by earning his own living and continuing to do good? Then, if you must hav preaching, get some smart young man who expects to amount to something in the future to declaim a sermon (not read it), written by somebody else, if he cannot write one himself.

No doubt there are thousands of good, intelligible, harmless sermons in existence (I do not include most sermons) which would bear repetition.

It is not necessary that every preacher's doctrin be taught. If, instead of the insipid twaddle which every parson seems to think he must provide fresh for every occasion, we had good standard sermons, the world would be the better. I do not mean that no new sermons should be written; that is, if we hav parsons at all, let them write what they choose; but let sermons become standard, if we are bound to go to church and hear them, before they are thrust upon us. I had rather reread a good book than be compelled to go through a worthless new one; sensible people would rather hear a good sermon for the hundredth time, even though the sermon were written one hundred years ago, than listen to the driveling cant which is so often imposed upon them and called preaching.

Do they pretend that the wicked are ever punished in this world? If so, then they must admit that God is very partial to some of his worst enemies. If they do not, then why do they always refer to the calamities which sometimes happen to overtake wicked, unjust men as "retributions of God," etc.? And why was it a "dispensation" when the preacher was knocked out of his pulpit by lightning a short time ago? Would it be a "dispensation" if Mr. Ingersoll should some time be stricken, or would that be a "retribution?" If God is so partial, why doesn't he strike his enemies—all of them? This would be more striking evidence than mysteries and miracles.

Just in proportion to the littleness of their talents are priests supplied with cant and hypocrisy. They are an unnecessary evil, but so long as men are the dupes of superstition, so long as men allow themselvs to think that it is a sin to think, so long will they desire "supplies," and the drones will continue to infest the country. The Religion of the Presidential Candidates.

The two leading presidential candidates this year are Presbyterians. The Democratic candidate, Grover Cleveland, says he was "born a Presbyterian;" that is, I suppose, that he is one of the elect. But I learn that when he lived here in Buffalo he made no pretensions to religion, seldom if ever attended church, was more often in the saloon, but since he became president he has had a pew in a Presbyterian church at Washington. But he takes no part in the services, and does not, I understand, partake of the communion. He takes his wine at home.

But it seems by a report in the World that Harrison, the Republican candidate, is an old-fashioned, hardshell, blue Presbyterian—one of the most activ men in the church—one of the pillars. A World reporter, who recently visited Indianapolis and attended Harrison's church, says:

> General Harrison's pew in the First Presbyterian church is away up in front under the very drippings of the sanctuary. It is in the high-priced row. Just behind the Harrisons' pew sits the general's partner.

The reporter, in giving an account of the services on the day he attended, says:

> When a tall, dark-haired girl and two children had been baptized and half a dozen persons admitted to membership in the church, General Harrison, along with a number of other church dignitaries, all of whom wore beards like his own, went forward to seats about the communion table. Mr. McKee and Partner Miller were among the elders. It was down the middle aisle that General Harrison passed, aiding in the distribution of the bread and wine; and in the prayers which punctuate the service he bowed his head low.

The home of the Republican candidate seems to be a very pious, godly town, full of churches, but the religion is not of the character that produces good morals, for we read in the World's report that:

> In two things does Indianapolis eclipse all cities—the number of its murders and its meeting-houses. No day has passed since the close of the Chicago convention but some sickening crime has been chronicled here. And in contrast to this every one of the plump dozen of Presbyterian churches, which presumably make the town better, was celebrating on this fair Sabbath morning the sacrament of the holy communion. It was so at General Harrison's church, and his silvered head, far up the long aisle, was not a shade less white than the snowy cloth which covered the bread and the wine.

If these candidates are honest men, they each believe that a heretic is as bad as, if not worse than, a murderer. Cleveland probably does not so believe, because he is not an honest Christian; Harrison does so believe, because he is an honest one. Now, the question arises, How shall a Freethinker vote this fall? Both of these candidates are evidently opposed to the Secularization of the state. They both support churches that are guilty of stealing money from the people by exempting church property from taxation. Can an honest Freethinker vote for either? This question I submit for the consideration of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Preachers on the Trains.

From the Standard.

"Do you see that man at the wash-bowl?" asked the commercial traveler, as he buttoned his collar and beckoned with his head toward the open door opposit the smoking-room sofa on which he sat.

Yes, I saw the man. He had washed, and was now brushing his hair while standing by the bowl, so that no one could approach it, though a line of disheveled passengers awaited their turn behind him.

"That man is a clergyman."

Indeed; but how did the commercial traveler know?

"How do I know? Easy enough. He has taken possession and is going to stay until he has brushed every hair into its particular place. He might just as well stand aside to finish his toilet, and let the others hav a chance to wash, but he won't. There are only three kinds of men who do that. One is the hog kind, the other is the kind that doesn't travel enough to know how, and the other is the preacher kind. That man is a traveler and not a hog; therefore he must be a clergyman. 'Why do clergymen act that way?' All of them don't, but those that do are simply indifferent to the comfort of others."

Sure enough, the offender proved to be a clergyman returning with half a dozen other clergymen from the New York conference. Having at last primped himself as if he were about to preach a trial sermon from a fashionable pulpit, he retired, and when next seen was making a bee-line for the breakfast car. He was just in time to get the only vacant seat. Others followed him who were compelled to wait their turn in the vestibule, where they peered anxiously and no doubt prayerfully through the plate-glass that barred their way.

"Now, mark my words," said the commercial traveler, who was with the waiting crowd in the vestibule, "that pulpit-pounder won't hurry a bit, although he sees us waiting; and ten to one he and the bishop alongside of him will keep people waiting after they are through. How do I know that's a bishop? I don't know it. But if he isn't he ought to be. He looks like a bishop—tall and broad, with massiv head, and ponderous chops, solemn and self-satisfied. There are only two places in the world for such a man. He couldn't be anything but a high-toned politician who does his tricks by proxy, or a bishop; and as he has adopted theological instead of political politics for a living, he must be a bishop."

After the commercial traveler had returned from breakfast, and, seated comfortably in the smoking-room, was lighting his cigar, he resumed: "Didn't I tell you so? Those two men would hav kept their seats till dinner-time if the caterer hadn't politely reminded them that others were waiting for their places."

Official Call for Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Local Secular Unions, Life, Charter, and Annual Members, and all Liberal citizens who support the Nine Demands of Secularism, Greeting:

You are hereby invited to attend the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, which will convene at Lafayette Hall, Wood street, near 4th, Pittsburgh, Pa., Friday, October 5, 1888, at 10 A.M., for a four days' session—5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th inclusiv.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State or Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Unions are entitled to seats and votes in this Annual Congress. Each Local Secular Union is entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates. Annual Members who pay or hav paid $1 in the national treasury are entitled to seats, but not to votes, except by unanimous consent of the Congress.

This Congress will specially consider practical questions tending to further agitation for taxation of church property; the abrogation of state aid to sectarian institutions; abolition of state, national, military, and prison chaplaincies; repeal of judicial oaths, Sunday and other oppressiv and unjust ecclesiastical laws; nullification of attempts to subvert our Constitution by a legal recognition of Theism in the American Magna Charta, and such other measures as will not merely thwart intended theological encroachments, but will absolutely expunge from our laws, state and federal, such insidious acts as hav already crept in to blot out mental freedom from our republic.

It is to be hoped that the addresses delivered will deal with the practical issues of the organization, so that there will be such an awakening of the people to these vital questions of the hour that a revival of the instinct of liberty and justice for all will necessarily result; that again from the Keystone state—the birthplace of our association—the clarion voice of freedom shall vibrate throughout the land.

Pittsburgh being situated almost in the center of a district containing many of our most distinguished workers, thinkers, and writers, besides the activ host within its limits, there is little doubt but that this Congress will be a glorious gathering of the forces who stand for mental liberty, as expressed in the desire for complete Secularization of the government.

Mrs. Freeman's Lecture.

The Chicago Secular Union celebrated Sunday, July 1st, instead of the 4th, it being much more easy to get a grand rally of Freethinkers, as Mrs. Freeman had consented to deliver before the local society the lecture she gave at the Congress, "His Satanic Majesty." In honor of this event our young people's society determined to spread themselvs, and the exquisit display of flowers, bouquets, and baskets they furnished did credit to their taste and liberality. As a matter of course, the Forum was filled with a splendid audience, who came to pay their respects to the foremost lady Freethought lecturer in the West and be edified by her wit and eloquence. In the audience I discovered several persons who hav been distinguished in the councils of this city and state. During the delivery of the lecture the audience manifested its transports of delight, but at the conclusion the speaker received a perfect ovation when Dr. Henry stepped forward and, on behalf of Mrs. Henry, presented Mrs. Freeman with a monster bouquet of roses rich and rare. Mrs. Freeman's lectures cannot be synopsized to do her justice; they should be heard to obtain the full benefit of her clear and faultless elocution—a matter upon which even her orthodox critics highly complimented her. The debate which followed was a series of coruscations, intellectual pyrotechnics, from our point of view; while, notwithstanding the opposition were given nearly all the time, they failed to score a point.

While our Union feels the additional expense quite a tax, the musical talent are indeed "drawing cards," for Miss Deal presides at the organ and piano with dignity and ability, while Mr. Card, our director, with the aid of our splendid soprano, Mrs. Madau, and Professor Metcalf, formerly of Boston, considered one of the best tenors in our city, played no unimportant part in the evening's entertainment. We anxiously look for the return of Mrs. Gruber, our most excellent alto, for when all together there is no "misdeal" in this quartet, notwithstanding some names might otherwise indicate.

Mayor Roche proclaimed what would be permitted and what forbidden on the Fourth, and a $50 fine is supposed to be incurred "for discharging guns, cannons, or pistols, whether loaded or blanks," and in resentment the heavy artillery are almost splitting the tympanum of my ears, and I absolutely can't hear myself think. The firecracker and nigger-chaser are hissing and popping, and the Catherine wheel is revolving on its axis, and to-night the rocket's red glare will go up and the blue lights come down, the punk will glow, the cannon will roar, and the toy pistol burst for the honor and glory of some old gents who adjourned without signing the Declaration on this day. Historical accuracy will hav to subside in the interests of the annual boom of the surgical industry, and the ebullitions which bubble up in the heart of the small boy. This sort of patriotism is an article which we suspect was, on account of the noise, imported from Ireland by parties who control American politics solely in the interest of the Green Isle.

The daily News has invested $10,000 as a permanent fund the interest of which is to purchase awards for the successful competitors for the Lawson patriotic medals for children in the high, grammar, and public schools. This year the scheme was inaugurated, and the rules observed were naturally more rigid than is likely to be the case in future, the essays being written in the school-room, no books but their Readers being allowed them.

Our Union feels jubilant that the only two young ladies still attending who are members of our Young People's Society captured prizes in their respectiv schools—Miss Bertha Riper, bronze medal, in the Oakley, and Miss Alma Wineman, silver medal, Central Park school. Bertha is treasurer of the Young People's Society, was our accompanist before we had the pipe organ, and is an excellent musician. Her mother for some time contributed her services to the Secular Union quartet, and we are under special obligations to parent and child. Bertha has won the sobriquet at school of "Our Freethinker," and she often givs the scholars a touch of her radical sentiments.

Miss Alma Wineman and her brother were the leading spirits in the establishment of the Secular Union Mutual Improvement Society, where they are undergoing a splendid and thorough training to fit themselvs to fill the posts of the older members and workers of the Chicago Union.

Miss Wineman is a girl of very great literary promis, having given one of the best and most humorous essays of our young people's course; and let me say that there is talent in that society of no mean order, which is bound to be heard from. Among the leading prize essays Miss Wineman's appears in this morning's News. It breathes the true spirit of patriotism. Read it:

In these days a great deal of what passes by the name of patriotism is a selfish striving for position and power. It does not show itself in honorable deeds, but in boastings, flying flags, and singing songs, and is the greatest curse that could befall any country. The true patriot is he who seeks in all ways to elevate his country by noble work; who livs an honest, sober, and upright life; who cherishes the memory and example of all truly patriotic men who by their sufferings in the cause of freedom hav won for the nation those privileges of free life and free institutions of which we are the inheritors and possessors.

The patriots of the early days showed their desire for justice by drafting and signing the Declaration of Independence, the grandest document ever written, declaring all men created free and equal, with the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Washington left behind him as one of the greatest treasures of his country the example of his stainless life; a great, honest, pure, and noble character; a model for his nation to follow in all time to come. The greatness of Washington and other great patriotic leaders did not consist so much in their intellect, skill, and genius, but in honor, truthfulness, and strong sense of duty. Such men are the life-blood of the country to which they belong.

The patriotism of Jefferson was shown by his writings. He was the father of a great party and the author of the Declaration of Independence. The name of Thomas Paine will be forever associated with the great republic. He was the first man to write these words: "The United States of America," and proposed the present federal Constitution, and always advocated in the strongest terms the establishment of a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. The patriotic devotion shown by the women during the Revolutionary and late civil wars was by the courage with which they gave up their fathers, husbands, and sons in the defense of their country and filled the places left vacant by them in taking care of the sick and wounded, and, though their names will never be known to the world, their deeds were prompted by the truest patriotism.

The civil war called forth the most patriotic feeling in the hearts of the people, for it was not, like the Revolutionary war, against a foreign power, but almost brother against brother. The patriotic soldiers could well say, "These are the times that try men's souls." Their voices went up in one cry, "The Union must and shall be preserved" and "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness given to all!"—determined that our flag should hav written upon it the three grandest words: "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity."

The memory of every soldier, from the greatest general to the lowest private, will be honored by all true patriots. Every true patriot will stand by his flag that was carried on the battle-field of death, and will teach his children that there is no nobler feeling, no grander ambition than to do all in one's power to elevate his fellow-men and the condition of his country; and, should danger ever threaten, theirs should be the willing hands to go forth in defense of the land they love the best.

They are both bright girls, and we are happy to call them "ours," for all "our" girls are bright and brave. Miss Etta Lovi won the gold medal in the high school, and there is no orthodoxy about her parents. The above is a practical answer to the correspondent who claimed our Union was disseminating Anarchy; and also proves that the brainiest children are those trained to be mentally free. Here is one forcible argument in favor of organization, if there were no more—it enables us to claim the victory which our people are constantly winning in the intellectual world. Therefore, organize, organize, and don't forget to take the prize.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

W. S. Bell in Dakota.

On June 7th I left Chicago for Dakota. My first stopping-place was Delavan, Minn., where I gave three lectures to full houses. This is Mr. W. F. Jamieson's old battle-ground. The tintinnabulations of the Bell possessed no mellifluous music for orthodox ears, but rather the contrary, and so the godly people had recourse to their usual methods of petty annoyances. While giving my second lecture, a young man of remarkable endowments gave a cat concert in the street, which some of my hearers seemed greatly to enjoy. However, after the patience of others was exhausted, they went out to interview the feline Thomas, but he had retired. The next evening, when I had nearly finished my lecture, the meeting was greatly disturbed by the jingling of a small piece of iron upon the window near which I stood. The operator of this inspired invention was secreted across the street, and worked the racket by means of a long string. In consequence of this annoyance I was compelled to finish my lecture some twenty minutes sooner than I otherwise should hav done. So much for godliness.

The first Freethinker I had the pleasure of meeting after I got off the cars was Mr. W. L. Horton, a brave and zealous worker, who has done splendid service in several towns where he has lived before coming here. He is a great admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which he keeps on his table in a TRUTH SEEKER Binder, and anyone may pick up and read.

Mr. James Geddes is a veteran in the Liberal cause, and an enthusiastic lover of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its cause. The orthodox all know him to be a fearless and honest man. No sky-pilot ever attacks him a second time on account of his Infidelity. Mr. Geddes is very desirous of having Mrs. Freeman lecture in Delavan, and regrets that she could not hav visited that place last winter. He made several inquiries about the lady in respect to her appearance upon the platform. I told him that when she stood up to speak she looked as if she might possibly weigh ninety pounds, but that when she got a-going she seemed to weigh a ton.

At the close of my first lecture I was introduced to Mr. E. S. Glick, who immediately arranged with me to giv one lecture at Minnesota Lake, some ten miles away. Although a young man, a Russian, not long in this country, he is an earnest worker, and paid all my expenses himself. My lecture at the Lake was received without any demonstrations, and so I was unable to judge how the nativs regarded it, as I left very early next morning to take the train, which was six miles away.

From here I had a long ride to Huron, Dak., but to my disgust I found, after riding about two hundred miles, that the person I was corresponding with at Huron was out of town, and upon inquiry I found that no arrangements had been made for my lectures, and, besides, I could find no Liberals. I returned to the depot, shook the dust off my feet against Huron, and took the cars for Jamestown. After another long ride with the thermometer at 102° in the shade, I reached my destination in the evening of the next day. I lost no time in finding the home of Mr. John Burns, and as I came within short range of his house I saw a man sitting in the shade apparently taking great comfort. I was right in supposing this to be my man, but I was a little off when I thought I could go up to him and hav a little talk before I should disclose my identity to him; for before he rose out of his chair he said, "This is Mr. Bell, I presume." At the close of my first lecture I gave an invitation to any minister present to defend his religion, when a young Episcopalian clergyman, the Rev. J. H. Wyatt-Hanath, stepped forward promptly, and with great confidence took up the cudgel for his creed. His courage, however, was greater than his capacity. At my third lecture he again came forward, and muttered as he came upon the platform that he would giv me all the debating I wanted. After he had finished his long and rambling talk I asked him if he was willing to debate the questions at issue between us. He promptly declined, saying he would not hav favored me as much as he had if he had known what kind of a man I was. I suppose this statement was strictly true. I then began to reply to his speech, and as I pricked his windbag he jumped to his feet and began to talk. I yielded once or twice to his interruptions, and then I told him he could not speak while I had the floor; but he was not willing to hav it that way, and persisted in talking while I was speaking. I had to suppress him in a most emphatic manner, when he grumbled something about this being a fair illustration of free speech.

My lectures caused a great deal of talk, and, I hope, may do some good.

Among the stanchest workers here are John Burns, J. T. Eager, P. W. Alley, James Boyd, Thomas Bowditch, Charles Flint, and Richard Long. I was very kindly and pleasantly entertained by Mr. Burns and wife.

I hav occasion for grateful recollections of Jamestown for the generous reward I received for my labors there. Mr. Reynolds is expected here on his return. Success to the Liberals of Jamestown. Let them organize, and secure more subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Ironclad Age, and Investigator. The latter is about the only Liberal paper taken.

On the day of my last lecture I received a telegram from Mr. S. E. Haight, of Milton, a town two hundred miles farther north, to come up there and ring my Bell for them. Of course I went. Milton is a small town not a year old, but has some of the oldest theology extant.

At my first lecture a man seated at the back part of the audience asked me to define certain words I had used. I did so in a most courteous way. He was not satisfied, and insisted upon asking more questions, and talking when he pleased. I told him that he could ask his questions after I had concluded my lecture. After causing much excitement and disturbance, he finally subsided, and when I got through with my lecture and invited him to speak, he had nothing to say.

My audiences were not large or enthusiastic, as there are not more than two or three genuin Freethinkers in the town.

Mr. S. E. Haight, a man without a God or devil, gave me the call to come to Milton, and also very kindly and attentivly entertained me. His family, of three boys and as many girls, are all lovers of music, and when they united in song, accompanied with the organ and violin, the entertainment was truly delightful.

The crops in Dakota look splendid. I think I never hav seen in all my life such a beautiful country as Dakota. Her climate, however, is very uncertain. No man knows what a day or an hour may bring forth.

Fargo, Dak., July 3, 1888. W. S. BELL.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

OLYMPIA, WASH. TERR., June 2d, 3d, 4th.—This is a delightful little place, situated on the southern extremity of a beautiful bay.

There is a strong Liberal element here; very little Protestantism—what there is is of the weakest nominal kind. I notice the Roman Catholic church here, as at Seattle and Tacoma, has the best sites and by far the largest and most valuable church property. Notwithstanding the fact that by an immense majority the people voted that all church property should be taxed, the legislature ignored the vote of the people and church property is exempt from taxation.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." We hav permitted the stealthy papistical anaconda to enfold us in its powerful slimy coils, and now writhe helplessly at its mercy. Free! we are not free; we are the slaves of church power. No man to-day has a reasonable chance of election to any office of importance if he is avowedly opposed to the encroachments of the church upon our liberties, or is unwilling to pledge himself to vote and favor donations of the public funds for propaganda work of the church. Let all lovers of freedom, all who desire a government by the people, for the people, ponder these shameful facts.

The trinity of Freethought here consists of good old, stanch, and ever-reliable J. S. Dobbins; the energetic and eccentric, but devoted Liberal, J. D. Munson, and the earnest, zealous young worker, Lou. M. Hartgrove. This young lady possesses great natural ability, intense love of the ennobling principles of Liberalism, and is with "a zeal according to knowledge" an enthusiastic champion for redress of working girls' wrongs. I confidentially predict her name will become well known in the Liberal ranks, and that she will be deservedly honored as an able and efficient lecturer. She possesses all the essential qualifications, only has natural diffidence and lack of self-appreciation to overcome.

I rejoiced to meet venerable Father George Collins, who, despite the infirmities of age, is ever zealous for the cause. He was among the very first to giv $10 toward the expenses. Also enthusiastic young Ben. Trojer, eager to do all in his power to advertise the lectures.

It is because I meet so many of the aged who find sweetest peace and comfort in the ennobling principles of Liberalism, which pluck from their heart all hate and fear and in their stead plant love and hope; because in every place I hav lectured from New York thus far around the Pacific coast I hav found the young, once freed from the shackles of priestcraft, devoting the strength of their young man and womanhood to advancing the cause, that my heart is filled with hope and courage. And I feel confident of the realization of those bright visions of a glorious future for humanity so ably and eloquently portrayed by Colonel Ingersoll.

I delivered four lectures at the town hall to large and enthusiastic audiences. The Rev. Mr. Garver, Congregationalist minister, attended two of my lectures, but all my kindest persuasion, my most earnest entreaties, failed to induce him to arise and defend his faith or say one word for Jesus. A valiant soldier of the Lord, he would or could not defend his blessed savior, whom the God of the Bible denies and repudiates (Isa. xliii, 10, 11; xlv, 5, 6; Hosea xiii, 4)—the marvelous redeemer, whom all Christians avow "poured out" his precious blood on Calvary's cross to save poor sinners, but which the New Testament positivly declares he never did until after he was dead (John xix, 32, 34). Despite these and a few hundred other little discrepancies, he and many others are honest believers in error instilled into them from earliest childhood.

In a sermon reviewing my lectures he admitted much I had proved, and declared he had become a good deal of a skeptic himself.

Having three days of rest, by careful nursing I regained health, and spoke with ease on Saturday night and Sunday afternoon; but foolishly, instead of resting, talked all the time between afternoon and evening lectures; caught fresh cold, inflammation in my side renewed, bad relapse. Sunday night quite hoarse. Monday night worse; spoke with difficulty. I had to take steamboat for Seattle at half-past 5 Tuesday morning. Damp, chilly, on the water so early, took fresh cold. In sad condition on arrival at Seattle.

SEATTLE, W. T., June 5th, 6th, and 7th.—This is the empress city of Puget sound, peerless in her magnificence and the wonderful wealth of her surroundings. Lumber, coal, and iron in abundance. A glorious future for this city is inevitable. Here I had the pleasure of meeting that martyr to liberty and his honest convictions, Walter Walker, a fearless, outspoken advocate of reason, right, and truth. I met a most cordial welcome from I. H. Hummell and family, pioneer Liberals. He introduced me to Brother E. Wilson, the builder and contractor, at whose palatial residence I found a most pleasant abiding-place.

I advertised to lecture that night. I summoned all my will power, but toward evening felt very badly. I called on Dr. H. Doane, the very able electrician, an educated scientist, and, of course, a pronounced Infidel. But he deemed it best not to take treatment till after my lecture. Lectures were delivered at Turners' Hall. The entire city being in a "boom frenzy," the attendance was quite small for so large a place. And for once I did not regret small numbers. It was with great distress I uttered each sentence. My voice was like the lugubrious croaking of a dying bullfrog, or the wheezy squawk of a young, over-ambitious hen attempting to crow. The kind, patient audience endured the manner for the sake of the matter. And I—well, I learned what it was to laboriously address an audience.

As Brother Wilson's house was a long distance from the hall, I could not take treatment that night. The next day I visited Dr. Doane, and under his skilful treatment, by application of electricity and a hot-box bath, my hoarseness was removed. At the second lecture my voice was all right, but a new horror. I could think only by intense effort. All my will power failed to giv action to my continuity of thought. My brain seemed torpid, clogged with mucous. It was as hard for me to get ideas as the night before it had been to speak sentences. Next day I paid another visit to good, kind Dr. Doane, and, thanks to his skilful appliance of electricity and a medicated bath, all difficulties were banished, and I had the satisfaction of delivering my last lecture with ease and comfort, and, I think, to the satisfaction of the audience, despite my unfit condition to speak on the preceding night. At the last lecture I had a very much larger attendance.

I became very much interested in a young Brother Wilson (no relation of E. Wilson, my host), a young lawyer, an intellectual young fellow of massiv brain and splendid physique, a hustler, as they term the very activ and energetic in this part of the country. He is a great admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and his admiration finds vent in practical work—he obtains new subscribers. I am hopeful, and did all I could to persuade him to devote all his time and talent to the great case of "Liberalism vs. Christianity." This coast would afford employment every night in the year, and every Sunday afternoon, for five able lecturers. Miss Hartgrove and Mr. Wilson are just the kind needed, clean of heart and clear of head, of unblemished reputation, earnest, self-sacrificing workers, lovers of humanity—not alone able and eloquent exponents of the principles of Liberalism but with daily lives in harmony with their profession.

Every possible encouragement should be given all such noble young advocates, so they may be induced to devote themselvs to the work. Everywhere there is increasing desire to hear, since the reply of Colonel Ingersoll to Dr. Field, and now a hundredfold more since his annihilation of poor old Gladstone. Intelligent people no longer regard orthodoxy with "reverential calm," but are anxious, excited, eager to hear the other side.

My appointments are: Washington territory: Shelton's Point, June 30th, July 1st; Elma, 2d, 3d, 4th; Montesano, 7th, 8th; Aberdeen, 10th, 11th, 12th; Skamokawa, 14th, 15th, 16th; Stella, 17th, 18th, 19th. The Disappointed Goat.—A Fable.

A certain goat, who thought he was a sheep, was very fond of reading the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew from the thirty-first verse, and of rubbing it into the wool of certain sheep whom he called goats, assuring them by texts of Holy Queer of the eternity of their dismal doom. So realistic was he in his descriptions that their wool seemed already singeing. But when the great day arrived on which he expected the delicious treat of seeing the Agnostic animals "left," lo! as he was prancing sanctimoniously over to the right center, a twenty-foot angel gripped his beard and pointed in the opposit direction.

"Sheep, sheep!" he bleated; "there has never been any truth seeking about me."

"Go 't——" persisted the angel. And he countermarched.

And now he beheld, and lo! the line was drawn differently from where he had expected.

On his side of it were the kind of sheep that hav beards and upright horns, with "elect" painted between them in lamb's blood. This lamb's blood they had all vainly thought would hav made them sheep, or as good.

On the opposit side were the animals who had always kicked up their heels at the fences and scarecrows set up by pious shepherds who were fond of mutton, and enjoyed the sinful pleasure of freedom in the fields of science, leaving good, rich wool often on the poor bushes, who were very grateful for it.

The unexpected turn of matters made the goat reflect how little his true interest lay on the affirmativ side of the question of eternal suffering; it seemed now to him a very detestable dogma, whereas it had before seemed transcendently beautiful. Indeed, he had always overlooked the application of it. He had too easily taken it for granted that he had only to do with the back of it, not its edge. He had settled the hash of the poor Agnostics so often—in imagination and on paper—that he had come to look upon himself as Gawd and the maker of this dogma, and now he wished he hadn't made such a rope to hang himself. And now appeared letters of flame in the sky, and what said they? Did they say: "Depart ye cursed unconverted ones who hav not the blood on your wool?"

No; they said: "Depart ye who had no tenderness in your hearts that theology could not kill; who wrecked the very groundwork of good by your teachings, turning love into hatred by your misdirections; rendering human progress impossible to those who became your victims by utterly corrupting their natural sense of justice, and extinguishing the natural light of reason as far as you could. As for these Agnostic sheep on my right hand, they shall be blessed for evermore, for they were faithful to the truth, loyal to the heavenly guide of reason, and valiantly (and it took some valor) set at naught the bulldozings and boycottings of creatures like you, with your little piddling, dried-up, juiceless hearts—which could not now, or hereafter, hav any fellowship with the great friends of your race—in order to do works which took no account of brain-spun lines of so-called faith, which, in reality, were only nonsense."

This was the sense of the doom now plainly appearing at this last great revelation, when the hearts of all were enlightened.

And the poor goat awoke—and behold it was a dream. HARDPAN.

Catholicism's Declaration on Liberty.

The papal church claims to be founded on the Bible, but, well aware of the fallaciousness of such a claim, and that the Bible contains no mention, much less sanction, of a pope, cardinal, archbishop, mass, indulgence, Virgin Mary, saints, crosses, and other distinctiv peculiarities of the papal church, it very rationally concludes that its common use would be more detrimental than beneficial. The blind zeal of cardinals and doctors, however, in voicing this convenient discovery, has betrayed them into startling concessions. Thus, Cardinal Hosius, the president of the Council of Trent, says: "The greater portion of the gospel came to us by tradition, very little of it from writing." Hermanus declares: "When the authority of the church leaves the scriptures, they are of no more account than Æsop's Fables." Canus mentions: "We are not to take the scriptures as the scriptures, without the authority of the church." And Hosius argues: "To ask if more credit could be given to scriptures than the church, is to ask if more credit could be given to the Holy Ghost speaking by the mouth of the church, or to the Holy Ghost speaking in the scriptures by the writings of the prophets and apostles." What an artful and convenient subterfuge! The church is founded on the scriptures, but the scriptures hav no meaning except what the church assigns them, and no authority except what the church permits! Well, then, if the scriptures hav no intrinsic sense or authority, then the church has none; for the church could derive nothing from the scriptures except what they possessed.

The cultivating influence of the church of ignorance and servitude was disastrous to learning in the extreme. The lights of knowledge were extinguished; the people were stupefied with ignorance; kings and nobles were plenty who could neither read nor write; priests could only trace a few words; Pope Gregory was so illiterate that it was doubtful if he could read at all; Pope Celestine was elected solely on account of his ignorance and stupidity; Pope Gregory I. severely censured the profane learning of a bishop who taught the art of grammar, studied the Latin poets, and pronounced, with the same voice, the praise of Jupiter and Christ; and Paul II. made war against all men of learning as enemies of the church, condemned them to horrible tortures under charges of pretended heresy, and, after all indication and testimony proved them to be innocent, still kept them in prison, declaring that, when he arrested them, he had asserted he would not release them under a year.

From the foul source of the Council of Trent, the Index Expurgatorius became consecrated as one of those papal doctrins "which had been regularly defined, from which nothing can be taken, no innovation introduced there, no addition made, but must remain untouched both in words and meaning." That the stream was worthy of its source, we hav the testimony of the most credible men in that corrupt assembly. A bishop, and one of the most eminent men in the Council of Trent, says: "The Holy Ghost had nothing to do in that assembly. All the counsels given there proceeded from human policy, and tended only to promote the pope's immoderate and shameful domination. Answers were expected as from Delphos and Dodona. The Holy Ghost which they boasted governed councils, was brought from Rome in a postilion-post cloak" (Sarpi, pp 841, 842). In a letter to Maximilian the same bishop further states: "The pope had a hundred [creatures] to one, and, in case that were not sufficient, he could hav created a thousand. We daily saw hungry, needy bishops come to Trent, youths, for the most part, that just began to hav beards, given over to luxury and riot, hired to giv their vote only just as the pope pleased" (Sarpi, p. 399). Again, the celebrated authority says: "Matters were brought to this pass by the inequity of those who came there, that the council seemed to consist not of bishops, but of disguised maskers; not of men, but of images, such as Dædalus made, which were moved by nerves not their own. They were hireling bishops, who, as country bagpipes, could not speak but as the breath was put in them" (Ibid).

Dupin, commenting on the second Nicean Council, says: "The Nicean, nevertheless, boasted of their inspiration. The synod, amid all its atrocities, pretended to the immediate influence of heaven. The divine inflatus, forsooth, passed through these sinks of pollution, and made the consecrated ruffians the channels of spiritual communication to men."

St. Gregory, bishop of Nazianzen, speaking of the second General Byzantine Council, characterizes it as a "cabal of wretches fit for the house of correction; fellows taken newly from the plow, the spade, the oar, the army" (St. Greg., Ep. Labb., ii, 1,158; Dupin, i, 259).

This great and adorable Catholic authority, in his "Standard of Theology," compares the dissensions and wranglings of councils to the gabble of geese and cranes; and says: "I never saw a synod that had a happy termination. These conventions, instead of diminishing, augmented the evils they were intended to remedy. Passion, jealousy, envy, prejudice, prevailed and surpasses all description."

And Cardinal Hosius, in delivering the farewell address in the name of Innocent III., who had presided over the Council of Lyons, to the court and citizens, said: "We hav effected a work of great utility and charity in this city. When we came to Lyons we found three or four brothels in it, and we hav left it, at our departure, only one. But that one extends from the eastern to the western gates" (Matt. Paris, p. 799).

Again: The pope denounces "the zeal of some to separate the church from the state, and to burst the bands that unite the priesthood with the empire." This is an authoritativ declaration that the papal despot is in favor of the union of church and state, and of the intermeddling of the priests with political affairs. He claims the investiture of supreme spiritual and political power over all government, whether it be monarchical or democratic; that he is the head, spirit, and laws of nations; that all human beings are his passiv, unresisting, corpse-like instruments, obliged to believe and do whatever he may dictate, and that they are eternally bound to this abject servitude, by the annihilation of liberty of conscience, opinion, and the press. He is an Anarchist of the blackest character. He detests all governments, despotic or republican, but despotic the less, because it is easier to govern one man than the many. This fact has been incarnadined in the history of every republic that has existed since the birthday of papalism. After Pope Benedict VI., in 974, had been deposed, imprisoned, and strangled, the able Crecentius was made consul, and governed Rome in that capacity. But Pope John XIV., in 987, exiled Crecentius, whom, however, Otho soon afterward reinstated. From 875 to 900, during an interregnum of the empire, the Roman people began to regard themselvs as sovereigns. They made and unmade popes at their option. Albera, son of Mososia, was raised to the head of political affairs. In 936, Pope John XI. was expelled from the city. Albera administered the government as consul, and chose, governed, and kept dependent the popes.

Arnold of Brescia, 1125, restored Rome to an image of her ancient liberty. He created a patrician, a president, and fifty-eight senators. But Pope Lucius organized a mob of priests and soldiers, and assaulted the republicans, who responded with a shower of stones. The papal army fled, and the pope was mortally wounded and died shortly afterward. Adrian IV. in 1154 cast an edict over Rome for this occurrence, and obliged the senate to exile Arnold. The unhappy patriot was arrested in Campana, burnt alive, and his sacred ashes cast into the Tiber.

In 1226, Innocent III. arbitrarily abolished the consulate, extorted oaths of allegiance from the senators, installed offices, usurped the sovereignty of the state, and became the spiritual and temporal despot of Rome.

Again: The pope "demands that all care be employed to prevent the circulation of writing among common people tending to the subversion of the fidelity and submission due to princes." How different is this demand from the declaration of Archbishop Spalding! The one demands that monarchies be protected; the other, that they be subverted. They both emanate from the same church, infallible, unalterable, unimprovable, identically the same in all ages and climes. But be not deceived. Though their avowals are different, their secret intentions are the same. The pope seeks to deceive monarchs; the archbishops, to deceive republics. They both falsify in the interest of the church. They both seek to win that they may destroy. Sarpi in his History of the Council of Trent, p. 395, when describing the manner in which Paul IV., elected in 1559, was accustomed to receive foreign embassadors, represents him as saying: "I am above all princes; I do not wish any of them to be too familiar with me. I can change kingdoms; I am the successor of those who deposed kings and emperors. I will hav no prince for my companion. I would hav princes under my feet [stamping on the ground], as it is fit; as it is his will who built the church, and placed them in that degree." Was it from a disingenuous desire to prevent the circulation of writing among the commonalty adverse to the fidelity and submission due to princes that Innocent III. publicly circulated his bill against the Magna Charta, annulling and quashing its provisions, the bonds and securities that had been pledged for its observance, that at no time they hav validity (Bull Matthew Paris, 1215)? that he afterward circulated an interdict against King John of England for refusing to acknowledge the pope's authority to appoint Stephen Landon to the archbishopric of Canterbury, suspending thereby the observance of the Catholic worship, and causing the dead for three years to be buried on the highway without the rites of interment; that in 1208 he excommunicated the king? that in 1211 he absolved the king's subjects from their oaths of allegiance, and prohibited all intercourse with him under pain of papal reprobation? that in 1212 he induced the French monarch to invade his kingdom? and that finally he obliged the king to surrender his dominion to the papal see, and pay for himself and heirs an annual sum of seven hundred marks, and for Ireland an annual sum of three hundred marks, on pain of forfeiting his right to the British crown? Was it from a sincere motiv to guard the stability of thrones that Pope Clement VII. excommunicated Henry VIII., king of England, with all his adherents and followers, declaring them incapable of absolution, the king of Christian burial, and all as smitten with the sword of anathema, malediction, and eternal damnation? Was it for the purpose of promoting the fidelity due to princes that the pope absolved and set free the accomplices, favorits, adherents, and advisers of the king from their oaths of fealty, vassalage, and subjection to him, and commanded them under pain of excommunication to wholly withdraw themselvs from obedience to him, and not recognize him as their superior, or to obey his laws? Was it from papal orders to instil submissivness in the minds of the subjects of kingdoms that the pope declared Henry VIII., his accomplices, adherents, counselors, and their descendants, infamous and incapable of being admitted as witnesses, of making wills, codicils, or other depositions, of granting anything, or of succeeding to any estate by virtue of any will or testament, or to any person intestate? Was it for the purpose of preventing insurrection and rebellion in the kingdom of England that the pope required and admonished the dukes, the marquises, and all others whatsoever, as well secular as ecclesiastical, and also men of letters, actually obeying King Henry, that without delay or excuse, they, with force of arms if need be, expel out of the kingdom and dominion them, and every one of them, their soldiers and stipendiaries, as well horse as foot, and all others whatsoever that shall favor them with arms? Was it for the purpose of interdicting treason to monarchs that the pope exhorted and required that even those that fight for hire, and whatsoever other persons that hav under them such as bear arms, either by sea or land, take up arms against King Henry? that they persecute them and every one of them, that they may by force compel them to return to the universal church and to the communion of the holy see? Was it from a tender regard for the security of kings and thrones that the pope declared that he from the same authority, knowledge, and power granted license, leave, and liberty to the same persons, of converting the same goods, merchandise, money, shipping, commodities, and letters, decreeing by these presents all these things wholly to pertain and belong to the captors? And that all persons deriving their origin from the same kingdom and dominion, or otherwise inhabiting them, and not obeying our commands aforesaid, wheresoever they shall be taken, shall be the slaves of the takers? Let the advocates of the papal church solve these problems.

By the authorities adduced we see what the papal church is. She is a church without religion; a church whose god is the pope of Rome; a church which proscribes the Bible on which she claims to be founded; a church whose nature and aim is political power; a church whose arguments are anathemas, whose laws are canons of corrupt councils, whose motivs are self-aggrandizement; a church that converts its devotees into senseless, conscienceless, reasonless, abject slaves; a church whose principle is Anarchism, claiming the right to intermeddle with the affairs of foreign governments, to dethrone rulers, absolve subjects from oaths of allegiance, create mobs, organize treason, and excite insurrection as she pleases; and which hesitates at the adoption of no means, however atrocious and inhuman, to accomplish her purposes.

Such being the papal church, her nature makes her the foe of liberty. And what is liberty, which is so distasteful to her? It is the spirit of equality, which givs equal rights to all. It is the spirit of morality, which bids man respect the rights of others as his own. It is the spirit of justice, that interdicts oppression and dissolves the chains of slavery. It is the spirit of nature, that bids the mind freely think, the conscience freely act; the reason freely judge; the tongue freely speak; the press freely print, and man freely develop the nature, genius, capacities, and greatness of his being. It takes a nation of subjects, and makes them a nation of sovereigns. It binds the rights of all in one harmonious whole, and formulates them into maxims, which he who best obeys best serves himself. It is the spirit of civilization; the mother of arts, science, eloquence, and song. It took ancient Greece, weak, ignorant, and barbarous, and made her the most powerful, enlightened, and civilized nation of antiquity. It took ancient Rome, a community of robbers and outlaws, and molded her into the conqueror of the world, the source of law, and model of heroism. It took the Tyrean refugees of Carthage, and made them the masters of the ocean, of manufacture, and the colonizers of the globe. It took Genoa, an insignificant town, and by instilling into it energy, frugality, and industry, enabled her to stud the shores of the Euxine with factories, to enlarge her domain by heroism, and finally to become the dictator of the throne of Constantinople. She took the marshy isles of the Adriatic, and made Venice their capital, famous for its military achievements, its schools of art, and the opulence of its citizens. These and other republics arose and flourished with liberty, but when she fell decayed and sunk into ruin. But this noble incentiv to all progress, genius, and greatness is denounced by the papal despot, who declares that liberty of conscience is a most absurd, erroneous, and pestilential doctrin; that liberty of opinion is a wild and raving notion, uttered with unblushing impudence; that the liberty of the press is the worst and never sufficiently execrated and detested institution; and that the advocates of the separation of the church from the state are profane lovers of liberty. Let it be remembered that these sentiments are those which the papal church has regularly defined, from which nothing can be taken away, no innovation introduced, no addition made, but remain untouched in words and meaning.

Baltimore, Md., June 3, 1888 JOHN ALBERGER.

Colonel Ingersoll on the Tariff.

THE TRUTH SEEKER for June 23d gives a very interesting report of the famous orator's opinion of what he rightly calls a great question on which it is "the duty of the laboring man in this country first to thoroughly post himself," "to endeavor to understand his own interest as well as the interest of his country," etc. Of course, the only way to do this is to read what can be said on all sides.

Another very good thing which Colonel Ingersoll said is this: "I am in favor of a sensible reform of the tariff, that is to say, I do not wish to put it in the power of the few to practice extortion on the many." In harmony with these sentiments, he has urged the nomination at Chicago of a candidate for the presidency who might hav been willing to reform the tariff, but we all know that Judge Gresham was badly defeated. The candidate chosen is in perfect harmony with the platform which distinctly opposes "the surrender of any part of our protectiv system," even in order to reduce the surplus in the treasury, now estimated at over $580,000,000. The Republican platform also declares its intention of keeping the duties on wool, and also making "such revision of the tariff laws as will tend to check imports of such articles as are produced by our people." Among these articles is nickel, which now, according to the Meriden Britannia Co., costs "about 65 cents a pound, of which 15 cents is protectiv duty." This is one of the cases in which, in Colonel Ingersoll's own words, "This tariff is added to the cost, and must be paid by the consumer." Thus, whenever we buy any article made of nickel, we pay this extra price. If the nickel is not imported, the money goes to one man, Mr. Joseph Wharton, of Pennsylvania, who owns the only mine worth mentioning in this country. All the people of the United States are thus taxed for the enrichment of one man. Need I say which party is pledged to keep up this and similar extortions? The history of tariff legislation during the last ten years shows which party has been trying to protect the many against the few, and which has stood in the way. Or take the case of the wool tax, which one party is trying to keep up or increase, while the other wishes to hav it repealed or reduced. This duty is levied to protect the woolgrower. The manufacturer has to pay it on all his wool, and he is repaid by a special duty of 30 cents per pound on all imported woolens, whether fine or coarse. What protection he gets against European manufactures is in the form of a value duty of 40 per cent on all cloth worth more than 80 cents per pound, and 35 per cent on the rest. The result is that the poor man who buys cloth worth 75 cents a yard, and weighing 28 ounces, pays a value duty of 26 1-4 cents, and also a special duty per weight of 61 cents, so that his tax is 87 1-4 cents, or 116 per cent. The rich man, however, is taxed but 58 per cent on a yard of cloth weighing but four ounces less, and costing $3 abroad; for in this case, the weight duty is but 52 1-2 cents, which, with the value duty of $1 20, makes a total of only $1.72 1-2. I agree with Colonel Ingersoll, that the tariff ought to be reformed; but I go with the party which intends to begin the reform by releasing the poor from having to pay twice as heavy a tax as the rich.

It seems to me all the more necessary to say this, because Colonel Ingersoll, to some extent, speaks as if the issue were simply between free trade and protection. So Mr. J. R. Perry has recently stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER, that the greatest question in American politics is that of "the tariff vs. free trade." I write this article mainly to insist on a fact, in proof of which I appeal to Cleveland's message, to the Democratic platform recently adopted at St. Louis, and to the men and papers generally who now favor Cleveland's reëlection. The question is not tariff vs. free trade, but simply tariff vs. tariff. I know of no one, of any authority in American politics, who wishes to do without any tariff. There are a few speculators, like Henry George, who wish to do this; and so there are other speculators who wish to get along without any president. It would be just as fair for Cleveland's supporters to say that the issue is between the president and no president, as it is for his opponents to say that the issue is between the tariff and free trade. But most of Mr. Perry's papers, like many other protectionist arguments, deals merely with an imaginary issue of not the slightest importance at present. What Cleveland and his party do wish, is to make such changes in the wool tax and other duties as to reduce the tariff to a hight somewhat about that at which, according to the estimate made a few years ago by one of the candidates for the recent Republican nomination, Senator Sherman, it would still "amply protect American industry." In other words, we want a tariff of about four-fifths of the present hight, with special reductions on wool and other raw materials.

Mr. Perry may say that this is what he means by free trade. If so, he certainly would call those men free traders who hav tried to introduce a tariff of about one-sixth of the present hight, with a long free list. But this is precisely what was done by Washington, Hamilton, and other fathers of the country nearly a hundred years ago. If every man who votes in favor of a tariff lower than that now in force is a free trader, then all Americans were free traders down to 1861; for we never had any tariff before the war so high as that which Mr. Perry and the Chicago platform support. Of the prosperity of the country under seventy years of low tariffs, I hav already said so much in THE TRUTH SEEKER that I need only say that I hav abundant reason to believe that a reduction of the tariff toward the Sherman estimate, as proposed in the Mills bill, now before Congress, would be the best possible thing for all American industries, except a few exceptionally situated monopolies, like Mr. Wharton's. What I hav just stated can be proved by many statistics, some of which I hope soon to present in these columns.

Just now it seems more important to call attention to a place where the colonel appears to hav been misunderstood by the reporter, namely this: "People who believe in free trade are always telling us that the laboring man is paid much better in Germany than in the United States." I can scarcely suppose that any free trader or tariff reformer is so culpably ignorant. There is no doubt of the wretched condition of the German laborer. The statements made on this point by protectionists are substantially correct. There is a great deal to this effect in a speech made last October by Senator Frye, and reprinted by the Home Market Club of Boston, under the title, "How Wage-earners Liv and are Paid in Free Trade Countries." There is no doubt but that the vast emigration from Germany spoken of elsewhere by Colonel Ingersoll is due to the poverty of her laborers. It ought, however, to be distinctly understood that Germany is under a high protectiv tariff. It should also be remembered that there are many other institutions working against the poor man all over Europe, as is pointed out by Colonel Ingersoll. Whatever sort of tariff we adopt in America, the laborer will continue better off here than in Europe. He need not dread any reduction which would leave wages where they are under one of the very lowest tariffs now in force, that of New South Wales. Laborers are paid as high there as here per day; their money goes much farther; and the eight-hour law has been for several years in force. I mention this merely to show that low tariffs are found in company with high wages, just as we find lower and lower wages with higher and higher tariffs, as we pass on from England, through Germany and Russia, to China, where there is so much hatred of foreigners and general stupidity, as to constitute the most efficient protection possible for all domestic industries. Comparing different countries together, we find wages highest wherever there is the greatest amount of production in proportion to the number of producers, whatever may be the tariff. Thus the tariff can raise or lower wages only by promoting or checking domestic industry.

It is regard for facts and principles like these, rather than for the Henry George theory of free trade, which inspires the main body of opponents to the present tariff. It seems to us peculiarly objectionable, because it has failed notoriously, after twenty-seven years of full trial, to giv the American manufacturer the exclusiv control of the home market. A tariff which enables Europe to supply us with half our silks, and a large part of our best cottons, woolens, and hardware, is not much of a success, even from the protectionist standpoint. What we tariff reformers want is, in the first place, to hav the American manufacturer fully supply the home market with every article which he can produce with due advantage, not only to himself but to his neighbors. And, in the second place, we want to enable him to undersell European manufacturers as successfully in Canada, Mexico, South America, Asia, Africa, and Australia, as is now done in the Sandwich Islands. Look at the facts. In 1875 we sold under our high tariff to those people about $450,000 worth of American goods, all of which were carried there under the British flag. We made a reciprocity treaty and the result, after seven years of free trade, was that in 1884 we sold to that same number of people $3 000,000 worth of American goods, which were carried by American sailors and under the American flag. Is not such an experiment worth repeating? Of course, there must be enough of a tariff to supply our national revenue. But why not reduce the surplus revenue by reforming the tariff sufficiently to make it as profitable for the American manufacturer to export his products as it is for the American farmer? The latter undersells the British employer of pauper labor at his own door. Why cannot our manufacturer do it too? There can be no better answer to this question than was given by a leading Republican, Senator Dawes, of Massachusetts, about a year ago: "No industrial policy will promote the highest prosperity of both labor and capital in this country, which fails to lay down the raw material at the door of the manufactory at the lowest possible cost." I hav shown how the price of wool and nickel is run up against the manufacturer by the present tariff, and how the two great parties stand on those points. The same substantially is true of iron, steel, tin-plate, copper, glass, coal, lumber, and almost every other article which the manufacturer has to purchase. This is what puts him at such a disadvantage against his rivals, not only in Great Britain, but in Canada, Germany, France, Belgium, and other countries which, while keeping up a high tariff in other respects, are wise enough to let raw materials come in free to their factories. They can do this without the risk which would be run by the protectionist party in this country; for that party would be outvoted, if it did not buy up the mine-owners and wool-growers by special bounties, given avowedly for that purpose. It is this tax on wool, with a few others of small amount on articles not likely to be brought any great distance over the Canadian border, which keeps many a farmer true to the old party, in spite of the plain fact that the tariff raises the price of every article he buys, but of scarcely anything that he sells.

The report of the tariff commission of 1882, as well as the Congressional proceedings in that year and the next, shows that very little attention was paid to the interests of anyone but owners of mines and factories in framing the present system of protection. And these millionaires were very properly called upon for money by the Republican League of the United States in the circular of May 25th, on the ground that they were "getting practically the sole benefit, or at least the most directly important benefit, of the tariff laws." These monopolists protect themselvs by making us pay twice as much as we should hav to under a just and equitable tariff fo our clothes, blankets, stockings, rice, sugar, salt, starch, nails, wire, drugget, earthenware, and window-glass. And any chance of prices being reduced by domestic competition is destroyed by the trusts, which are formed in order to keep production down. Of course, keeping down production means keeping down wages also. Thus, the great question in politics is not the tariff vs. free trade, but the millionaires' tariff vs. the people's tariff. F. M. HOLLAND.

Ye Scheme to Bagge Penn.

The following fabricated letter first appeared in the Easton, Pa., Argus many years ago, and has been frequently republished:

September, 1682.—To Ye Aged and Beloved John Higginson.—There be now at sea a shippe (for our friend, Elias Holdcraft of London, did advise me by the last packet that it would sail sometime in August) called ye Welcome, R. Greene was master, which has aboard a hundred or more of ye heretics and malignants called Quakers, with W. Penn, who is ye scamp at ye head of them. Ye general court has accordingly given secret orders to Master Malachi Huxett of ye brig Porpoise to waylaye ye said Welcome, as near ye coast of Codd as may be, and make capture of ye said Penn and his ungodly crew, so that ye Lord may be glorified and not mocked on ye soil of this newe country with ye heathen worships of these people. Much spoil can be made by selling ye whole lot at Barbadoes, where slaves fetch good prices in rumme and sugar; and we shall not only do ye Lord great service by punishing ye wicked, but shall make gayne for his ministers and people. Yours in ye bowels of Christ,

COTTON MATHER.

In September, 1682, Cotton Mather was a divinity student, only nineteen years of age. Therefore he would not hav been likely to be made the confidant of any "secret orders" of the "general court" of Massachusetts, much less to hav been in correspondence with Elias Holdcraft (or Holcroft, as the name was first printed), of London, whoever that person might be.

When the letter was first published it was said to hav been deposited with Mr. Judkins of the Massachusetts Historical Society, by the late Robert Greenleaf, of Malden. But there was no such librarian, and no such person known as Robert Greenleaf, of Malden. So said Mr. Spofford, the librarian of Congress, when he first saw the letter in 1872, and he pronounced it a clumsy forgery.

This is the sixth time I hav exposed it in various papers, but, like a multitude of other frauds, it seems to be as live as ever. BURR.

The Editors and the Preachers.

The prominence of Colonel Ingersoll in the campaign, and the possibility before the Chicago convention adjourned that Mr. Gresham, a reputed Liberal, might be the Republican standard-bearer, has led the pulpit into politics and the press into the pulpit. Republican and Democratic editors alike are attending prayer-meetings with regularity, and the wave of piety now sweeping over the country is something phenomenal. If it were not the rankest hypocrisy, the church might, like St. Paul, take courage and thank God.

Commenting upon the recent attempt at the Republican ratification meeting of the chairman to make a Bible quotation, which failed because the audience laughed the orator down, shouting to Colonel Ingersoll to "watch him, Bob," the Star of this city, a Democratic journal pretty near the White House throne, says:

"The Republican party is now, in some matters, very much mixed. In the past, it has claimed the Bible and everything else that was 'best and purest' as peculiarly its own. It has, in a fashion, put out a claim that it was essentially deity's own party, and that all Democrats were, as to religion and morality, somewhat off color. It has placed Democracy among the goats, and on the left hand.

"But we find now, and at the outset of its campaign, an element in the Republican party (which has hitherto, in a fashion, directed deity what to do in party and national affairs) that heartily cheers and sympathizes with a man who does not believe either in God or in the Bible, and whose earnest and activ endeavor is to wipe the book out of existence. And this element applauds and indorses the single cry raised at its first campaign gathering of 'Watch him, Bob!' whose meaning is that 'Watch him, Bob' shall 'go for,' riddle, and ridicule in his usual able fashion any allusion or quotation from the book which, judging from some past Republican sentiment and expression, Lloyd Garrison, John Brown, and Wendell Phillips revised, corrected, and vastly improved (to suit the times).

"We congratulate our Republican friends on their having so early in the contest developed the stirring anti-Bible, anti-deity, and anti-religious cry of 'Watch him, Bob!'"

This is a very palpable attempt by the Star to raise religious rancor and influence votes against Mr. Harrison, because one of his chief supporters is an Infidel.

A paper of another stripe—one of the most important in the Southwest—has also come forward for prayers. This was before Harrison was nominated, and the anxiety of the editor for his soul's welfare was prompted by the fear that Gresham might be the convention's choice. Therefore the general policy of the country toward Infidels was outlined. "One of the chief glories of our government," oracularly observes this newly hatched Christian, "unquestionably lies in the fact that it guarantees perfect freedom of religious belief and practice. Men may hold what opinions they please with entire security of estate and reputation, and to prefer one system of faith or form of worship over another is an act that is accounted consistent in every way with the obligations of citizenship. But at the same time it is insisted that a man who discards all sects and refuses his assent to Christianity in any manner is more or less censurable for abuse of a rare and splendid privilege. That is to say, public sentiment holds that in a country where religious thought is so unrestrained, a man should believe something, and recognize the general value of church enterprises and influences."

Precisely! Our editor is a glorious disciple of one of more renown, a certain Martin Luther, who claimed the right for everybody to read the Bible, but when after reading it, they pronounced it false, he promptly suppressed them. So it is with our recent convert, who further lays down the law:

"When we say that it is improper to apply a religious test to a candidate, we do not mean that it is immaterial whether he has any religious belief at all or not. What we do mean is that we accord him the right to choose between different denominations, but not to reject all plans of religious philosophy and experience, and deny the authenticity of Christianity in toto. He may be a reputable and capable man, but that is not conceded to absolve him from the duty of identifying himself in some degree with religious institutions and undertakings. He must at least acknowledge the validity and usefulness of religion in the abstract, and refrain from giving encouragement to its enemies. We believe in religious freedom to the point where it becomes anti-religious license, and there we draw the line. The politicians, large and small, understand this for the most part, and hence comes their anxiety to avoid suspicion of Infidelity, and to put themselvs on good terms with the churches. The custom does credit to their intelligence, and it serves also to keep alive in our politics the wholesome idea that this is a Christian nation."

Coming back to New York, now, we find this in the Times:

"Mr. 'Bob' Ingersoll will be kept very busy by the Republicans between now and election in breaking the influence of the free whisky plank among the temperance people. He is an expensiv speaker in more ways than one, but he is admirably adapted to this particular work. It is understood, also, that a cheap edition of his principal attacks upon the Christian religion is to be widely circulated among the churches and the Sunday-school teachers, in order to reinforce his arguments to the temperance people. This will serve a double purpose. It will put 'Bob' in his true light as an authority on the principles of morality, and it will tend to spread the light of Infidelity and skepticism among the deluded victims of the Christian faith. Of course, if the colonel's views as to religion are sound, it is among religious people that they should be disseminated. Mr. Harrison, as a fervid Presbyterian, was at first inclined to object to this scheme, but we understand that Mr. Kerens, and others who were cognizant of Mr. Ingersoll's valuable missionary labors in the Star route cases, hav persuaded the candidate to withdraw his objections. We look for a good deal of interest in Ingersoll when he gets really settled down to his pace in the advocacy of the abolition of the whisky tax and the deity."

This is in keeping with the line of thought of the preachers on the same subject, though not quite so bigotedly expressed. As a sample of their style we take a recent sermon by a Far Western Baptist minister:

"The voice of inspiration, the voice of reason, and the voice of history unite in speaking to us the truth before us, 'If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?'

"Here is the question for us, 'Are the foundations then laid and builded upon impaired?' I know it is the purpose of the politician and demagog to treat this question with contempt and ridicule, but it is the province of history to declare that God deals with it as a solemn fact. So let us face it to-day. I know it is the popular thing to declare that the days of the Puritans were days of intolerance and bigotry; that they proclaimed religious liberty and denied to others the liberty they claimed. I am willing to grant it. They were human, and to err is human. Their principles were right if they did err.

"Is that foundation-stone crumbling? Is there an atmosphere inimical to its permanency? I am sure there is—an insidious, almost impalpable, antagonism to religious liberty, that would deny the right of any man to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience, but only according to an unjustified and impious dictator. While those are sleeping who died that their country might liv, comrades, watch for that foe.

"Is this foundation-stone decaying? I think it is. The elements of Infidelity and Atheism in their various forms are arrayed against it. They hav the audacity to demand, under the name of Liberalism, the exclusion of the Bible—God's law—from every national institution. Not only are they not satisfied to secretly and cunningly devise against it, but this social pestilence dares to assemble in convention, and, with blasphemous utterances, demand that the only civilized nation in the world that would tolerate such presumption shall destroy its foundation at the dictation of the fool who hath said in his heart, There is no God. Better, aye, ten thousand times better the practical intolerance of Puritanism than the national pestilence of lawless Liberalism!"

Another preacher has also taken up his cross because things don't just suit him. A daily mugwump paper prints this item:

"Those who are disposed to deride Sunday-school principles in politics will do well to pay special heed to the effect upon such eminent exponents of Christian sentiments as the Rev. Dr. A. F. Shauffler, who declares that the free whisky plank of the Chicago platform and the prominence of Bob Ingersoll as its advocate hav driven him from the support of the Republican party. Like thousands of others who hav up to this time adhered to the Republican party, he is in favor of temperance and tariff reform, and thinks that conscience is a safe guide in politics. But fidelity to conscience is now subject not only to derision as characteristic of 'Sunday-school politics,' but to denunciation as treason to party."

Judging from these quotations, Infidels in the United States ought to be thankful that they are allowed by the Christians to liv, without having the presumption to ask for legal equality with the saints who hav inherited the earth. The desire to persecute for opinion's sake is still strong in the hearts of our "beloved brethren," and only the lack of power prevents its being done. We will giv the editors, however, the benefit of the doubt whether their religion is more than skin-deep, and charitably believe that their exhortations to piety are for campaign purposes only.

But we hope the abuse of Infidels will go on. Every time Christianity shows its true character somebody gets so disgusted with it that he becomes a Liberal.

The Slave's Submission.

The Ancient Order of Hibernians of Nebraska recently held a state convention at Lincoln, at which a Mr. Corcoran delivered an address which the Daily State Democrat says has received "very favorable comment both by members of the order and the public at large." The following are the most important portions:

"The unchangeable watchword of the Irish people is, 'For Faith and Ireland.' Who shall separate them? No men, nor even an angel from heaven, will be listened to when attempting to teach the Irish people in opposition to the pope. On that point the Irish people hav always been, and with God's help always will be, firm and steadfast. Let us once for all take our stand on the Rock of Ages, and when the whirlwinds of Anarchy roar around us, and thunder of passion bursts overhead, and the lightning of blasphemy flashes across the heavens with a brilliancy to fill the souls of men with awe, we will laugh at them, and mock at them, and mark our foreheads with the sign of the cross. 'Stat crux dum volvitur orbis,' rings out the voice of the illustrious Lacordaire, startling the multitude of the assembled Atheists of Europe in the cathedral of Notre Dame. The cross stands whilst the world revolves. Ireland has fought through the bitter struggle of three centuries without human aid or sympathy. Now that we hav the sympathy of the Christian world we hav reason to hope for success in the near future. But let us not seek to gain the sympathy of men by such weakness as to act in a manner, or to use language, which, no matter how much we may profess respect, is certain to create the impression that we are not so loyal to the pope as our forefathers. We would insult our separated Christian brethren by such conduct, for it would logically imply that we considered them so utterly devoid of principle themselvs that they would appreciate a disregard of principle on our part. In the long run pronounced and manly fidelity to principle gains the respect and sympathy of even those who differ from us. We are Christians. Let us act and speak always like Christians. Christian charity does not mean weakness or disregard of principle. It may be asked, as it is often asked, What is a Christian? To that question there is but one answer. The only answer which is true, which is practical, which is a straight answer to a straight question, is simply this: Christianity consists in believing and following the teaching of the vicar of Christ.

"For ourselvs, let us refuse to fall into line with the follies and the isms affected by the languid dilettanti of the rich salons of the modern Babylons. Let us refuse to join in chorus with the nauseating laudations of the so-called modern thought, which is insignificant in the presence of the thought of Aristotle, and at the present moment beaten all along the line on the field of reason by the intellectual giants of the Catholic church. To-day you see the self-elected apostles of this modern thought flying everywhere from the encounter, by their surrender of positiv teaching, and taking refuge in Agnosticism, which is the innermost recess of the rathole of doubt. Let us not be entrapped by the shibboleths of philanthropy and humanity. Christianity is above all. For who is like unto God? Christianity is, in a word, divine. Humanity is but created and corruptible dust united for a little while with created but immortal soul. Not science, not philosophy, not reasoning with so never faultless logic, but humble Christian prayer alone, can transform the world of to-day, healing the souls of men by a miracle greater than any healing of the body."

These words were uttered in the interest of Irish freedom. Can anything be more humiliating than the spirit they breathe? "Though thou slay me, yet will I trust in thee," says this orator to the pope. And though the pope has allied himself to the force responsible, according to Mr. Corcoran, for the crimes against Irish liberty, yet the pope must hav cheerful submission on the part of his Irish subjects. If they giv it they deserve to lose their liberty.

The trouble with Ireland has always been too much faith. Before Henry VIII. suppressed the monasteries in Ireland, the people were really slaves to the Catholic church. In exchanging bishops for Protestant landlords, they hav gained considerably. Ireland was worse off under the church than under Protestant England. Besides owning the lands, the clerical authorities were immoral and dishonest—no better than the Irish lords who vied with the English oppressors in swallowing estates confiscated by "the Old Harry," as Catholics are pleased to term the king who basked in "the gospel light that dawned from the eyes of Boleyn." The church was a practical slave-owner, and the Irish people were practically slaves to them and to Catholic lords. They were ignorant and besotted, lived in hovels, and bred like pigs. They threw their lives away in petty wars, died of famin and pestilence, and were under the church as miserable a nation as ever claimed a nationality. Why, then, should they still hav faith in a religion which kept them in such abject poverty, and submit to a pope whose predecessors practically owned them as a Southern slaveholder owned his slaves?

The bed-rock trouble of Ireland is that the people are small tenants, living on other people's land, and paying exorbitant rents. But it is no worse to pay rent to a lay landlord than to hav a bishop of the church take all the farm products to support a monastery. And it makes starvation not a whit easier to hav faith that the fellow who steals your food is the vicar of God. If the Irish people had had less faith in the past they would now hav more land. Ireland started wrong, and from St. Patrick's time to the present the priest has been her temporal enemy as well as the British landlord, who but holds lands wrenched from the miserly and tyrannical grasp of the church. We are not excusing England for the policy she has pursued toward Ireland. The British kings hav been about as heavy oppressors of the Irish people as was the church four or five hundred to fifteen hundred years ago. But it is useless for Irishmen now to expect liberty and still be as loyal to the pope as were their forefathers. Loyalty to the pope and political liberty never went together in Ireland, and never will unless it suits the political machinations of the Vatican to interfere in Ireland's behalf.

An Irishman who studies the history of his country and then holds that "Christianity is above all" is no true friend of Irish freedom.

Christian Forgeries.

A few weeks ago there appeared in the Evening Star, of Washington, a letter said to hav been discovered in England, written by John Wesley to the Earl of Dartmouth, about American affairs. It was dated June 14, 1775, came by cable, and has been extensivly copied. The writer (or cabler) says:

"All my prejudices are against the Americans, for I am a High Churchman, bred from childhood in the highest notions of passiv obedience and non-resistance, yet I cannot help thinking, if I think at all, an oppressed people hav asked nothing more than their rights, and this in the most modest and inoffensiv manner, in which case I would allow them; but, waiving all considerations of right and wrong, is it common sense to use force against Americans?"

This letter is a manifest forgery. John Wesley was a High Churchman when he preached in Georgia, but on his return to England, in 1738, he "got religion," and from that time he was no longer a High Churchman, unless in a Pickwickian sense. He evoluted, or devoluted, out of the established church when it refused to tolerate or recognize him. He was compelled to send forth lay preachers, most of them of a low grade of intellect, and thus he was enabled to magnify his importance as the head center of Methodism.

But there is other proof of the fabrication of this letter. Instead of being a friend to the American cause in 1775, John Wesley was a bitter Tory. This was shown in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 4, 1888, by our correspondent W. H. Burr. John Wesley wrote a pamphlet against the complaints of the American colonists entitled, "A Calm Address," which was sharply reviewed by "Casca" in the English Crisis of March 23, 1776. In that review "Casca" (whom Librarian Spofford, as well as Mr. Burr, identifies as Thomas Paine) said: "Governments are instituted not for the sake of the governors, but of the governed." "This," he added, "is an eternal truth," but "Wesley is not ashamed to assert the contrary."

A few years ago a "Memorable Letter from Daniel Webster" was communicated to the Christian Union by John S. C. Abbott, who said he obtained it from his old classmate, Hon. Samuel P. Benson, of Maine, who vouched for its authenticity. The letter was dated Marshfield, June 15, 1852. Unfortunately for its alleged authenticity, Daniel Webster was not at Marshfield at that time; he was in Washington, attending to his duties as secretary of state; and on the very next day, June 16th, he wrote a letter from Washington to the Rev. Dr. Putnam, of Roxbury.

The forged letter was read by the Hon. S. P. Benson, at a celebration in Winthrop, Maine, in 1875. It purported to hav been written by Daniel Webster to Professor Pease, of the Five Points Mission Sunday-school, expressing not only Webster's own sentiments, but those also of Jefferson in favor of Sabbath-schools.

"Many years ago," said the pseudo Webster, "I spent a Sabbath with Thomas Jefferson at his residence in Virginia. . . . While engaged in discussing the beauties of the Bible the sound of a bell broke upon our ears. Turning to the Sage of Monticello, I remarked, 'How sweetly, how very sweetly sounds the Sabbath bell!'"

Aside from the improbability that the youthful Federalist of Massachusetts should visit the aged Republican of Virginia in the days when party spirit was far fiercer than now, and aside from the assumption that a church bell was within hearing of Jefferson's mountain home, the use of the expression "Sabbath bell" before the year 1826 is suspicious. Furthermore, Webster notices that Jefferson uses the term "Sunday-schools," instead of what he calls the "more correct word Sabbath." Sunday-schools were first introduced in New York in 1817; and if they ever attracted the attention of Jefferson in the last decade of his life, he nor anyone else in his time, probably, ever heard them called anything but Sunday-schools.

But most positiv proof of the forgery of the letter is found in that part of it which says that while these two statesmen were discussing the beauties of the Bible, Webster took up "a fine old folio of scriptures" lying before him "of 1458," and read aloud some sublime passages from Jeremiah. If the writer had dated that "fine old folio" only about twenty years earlier, it would hav preceded the discovery of printing. There is no old folio Bible printed as early as 1458, but there was a quarto Bible printed by Gutenberg between 1450 and 1455, copies of which are exceedingly rare and valuable. But that was printed in Latin, and it is not likely that Jefferson owned a copy; much less that young Webster was able to edify the Sage of Monticello by reading to him Jeremiah's Lamentations in Latin.

Prohibition in Massachusetts.

The Prohibition world has had a surprise. A real, consistent Prohibitionist has been at last discovered, and the law-and-force people of New England hav honored him with a dinner. His name is David I. Robinson, and he lives in Gloucester, Mass. A few days ago he was the mayor of the city where he resides, but no such dishonor clings to him now. In the might of his virtuous principles he has arisen and shaken the polluted thing from his pure shoulders. It seems that Gloucester voted "license" at the last municipal election; and that the board of aldermen, in accordance with the expressed will of the majority of the citizens, granted to several applicants licenses to sell intoxicating liquors, but Mayor Robinson refused to affix his official signature to the unholy documents; hence his birth into notice. The matter was carried to the supreme court of Massachusetts, and the mayor was ordered by that august power to sign the licenses granted by the board of aldermen; but rather than permit his right hand to perform such an ignominious deed he resigned his office. In this day of rather miscellaneous temperance principles such an act has a wholesome flavor. No wonder the men who hav "talked" Prohibition for politics only should see a hero in this doughty mayor. But it may be that his fame is bigger than his act after all. We do not believe that his resignation stopped the sale of a single glass of beer, or added a single name to the roll of those who "touch not, taste not, handle not" the exhilarating beverage. The curious part of this affair is that the whole Prohibition element was surprised that one of their number possessed courage enough to take such a step. Office is the goal of the average Prohibition advocate's ambition, and when this goal is reached it is not to be resigned unless some other office says, "Come up higher."

It was doubtless due to the curiosity of the political Prohibitionists to see the man who could resign his office as mayor of Gloucester rather than sign a few liquor licenses, that David I. Robinson was dined in Boston by his fellow-Prohibitionists. There was one man present at this dinner who was, perhaps, more paralyzed by the spectacle of virtue exhibited by this humble Cape Ann citizen than any other—that was ex-Gov. John P. St. John, of Kansas. All the mighty persuasiv force of cold water could not account for such Alpine hights of self-abnegation and sacrifice as he beheld before him. He wrestled with the stupendous moral problem, and endeavored to solve it by every known rule of human conduct, and finally announced to the world that such behavior was "a mystery" to him until "he heard that Mayor Robinson was a Christian." Then he made this mysterious statement: "No true follower of the Lord Jesus Christ could be responsible, directly or indirectly, for the existence of a legalized liquor shop."

We do not see what "Jesus Christ" has to do with temperance, or why a man may not be a Christian and manufacture, sell, or drink liquor, if he wants to do so. We hav Bible authority for stating that Jesus manufactured and drank intoxicating liquors. This business of making the temperance cause depend upon Christianity ought to be shown up for the pious hypocrisy that it is. Everybody who can read knows that the Christian scriptures indorse the use of liquors. To declare otherwise is to state a falsehood. It is time to acknowledge that temperance has nothing to do with Christianity, and Christianity nothing to do with temperance, St. John, of Kansas, to the contrary notwithstanding. A man may hav every vice that flesh is heir to and be a Christian. He may lie, steal, be a drunkard and a rum-seller, and be a Christian. He may violate every one of the Ten Commandments and be a Christian still. We challenge any Christian church in the land to show the contrary. And a man may hav every virtue that has blossomed from the human heart and not be a Christian. He may be truthful, honest, upright, sober; a clean, pure, whole-hearted man, and not be a Christian. He may keep every one of the Ten Commandments, and fifty more just as good, and not be a Christian. And we challenge every Christian church in the United States to show to the contrary. Virtues do not make men Christians; vices do not prevent them from being Christians. This is the shame of Christianity. Our age and our country should be ashamed of such a religion as this, and ashamed of the men and women who profess and support it.

Editorial Notes.

THE Chicago faith-cure Christians hav landed another poor dupe in the madhouse, and now the Chicago authorities are endeavoring to land the faith curists in the penitentiary. It is to be hoped the authorities will be as successful as the Christian impostors.

THE Independent says that in the reply of the ober-procureur of the holy synod of Russia to the memorial complaining of the outrageous treatment by the government of Protestants in the Baltic provinces, is this sentence:

"We believe that perfect liberty only exists for those who pass from faith to skepticism."

The Independent comments: "No wonder skepticism grows under the administration of the czar." It occurs to us that both the ober-procureur and our religious contemporary are right.

A HARLEM Christian has just had a neighbor arrested for cutting grass for his cow on Sunday. In the police court the judge turned sharply on the policeman who made the arrest. "Suppose," said his honor, "the man's cow had fallen into a loathsome pit; would you hav arrested him for pulling the beast out on the Sabbath day?" "I would not," said the officer, and he hung his head to escape the fiery glances of the indignant judge. "The prisoner had as much right to mow grass to feed his hungry cow as he would to hav rescued her from a pit into which she had fallen," continued the justice. "The prisoner is discharged."

MR. GEORGE W. GOODFELLOW, of Aylmer, Ont., committed suicide upon being detected in unnatural intimacy with his own fifteen-year-old daughter. Concluding a report of the matter, the Toronto weekly Globe describes Mr. Goodfellow: "He was an Oddfellow, a Freemason, a United Workman, and a strong temperance worker. It is said that his wife and children were under such a complete state of subjection to him, from the effect of the brutal treatment and threats, that from fear of their lives they were compelled to keep silent. Only a few weeks ago Mr. Goodfellow stood up in church and gave his experience, stating that he never felt so happy as he had of late, and prayed that many more might be led into the right path."

Letters from Friends.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., June 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for another year's subscription to your valued paper. We had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Remsburg last Tuesday—a perfect gentleman, and very convincing in his arguments. Inclosed item on Judge Severens's treatment of the boy I cut out of my paper; the judge is one of the few noble ones who sit on the bench of law. Very truly yours, SAM ROSENBAUM.

COALING, ALA., June 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 9th just fills the bill. I wish you could send me several of that date. I want them to canvass with. Some of my friends are sending me Talmage's sermons on "Infidelity." Please state in your paper that if Freethinkers will mail me some of their reading when they are through with it I will keep it circulating. I think you will still hear from me. Some would subscribe, but money is scarce. H. J. WARD.

BRANDON, MANIT BA, July 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The only sense in which we can say there is a God or a devil is this: When one is going to do wrong, or thinks of doing wrong, he feels himself tempted by something—by certain feelings, the worst part of him. This we may call the devil. But if he pauses a moment to reflect, something will speak through his conscience and tell him he is going to do wrong. The feeling will leave instantly. I speak from experience. And that is what I call a supreme being. Yours respectfully, ARTHUR WILLIAMS.

PAULINE, ARK., June 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The Rev. Gunsalus, when he opened the Chicago Republican national convention by prayer, ending by saying, "We ask thee for thy blessings upon this convention, that its work may be done for the glory of this cross," must hav thought that God was in the Constitution. We were not aware before that delegates went to the national convention to work for the cross of Christ and giv it a boom. We thought the Republicans met in convention for the purpose of perpetuating the principles of liberty and national prosperity. W. R. BACHELOR.

MONTE VISTA, COL., June 17, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Inasmuch as many Liberal friends hav written me for information in regard to the wonderful gardens of San Luis Park, Col., I would be pleased to say that those are the kind of people which I wish to see come here, and those wishing information can obtain the same by writing me, inclosing ten cents in postage currency to pay mailing expenses.

If the unfortunate Liberal lady in Lexington, Ky., who appealed to me under date of April 21, 1888, will send me her street number, I will respond to her call.

Written on a high mountain in a wilderness of pines—
JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

MARSHFIELD, ORE., June 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. S. P. Putnam has just left, after giving us his opinion of "The Bible," "The Dangers Ahead," and "Creation." We got a good supply of campaign reading. Hav just read the "Field-Ingersoll Discussion," and feel satisfied that neither one of those gentlemen is injured by the discussion. One believes because he cannot help it; the other disbelieves for the same reason; while many of us poor hungry souls are enabled to read their logic and gather up their gems of thought. I suppose the Christians claim Field the victor; while we Freethinkers feel and know that our favorit lecturer is always able to carry off the palm of victory. And yet I know it is not for victory he works; he only tells his true and honest thoughts.

Mr. Putnam's coming reminded us that it was time to pay for another year for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please find inclosed $3. MRS. E. A. HILBORN.

PACIFIC, MO., June 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am proud to say that THE TRUTH SEEKER is growing better—great and grand. That such is a fact is sell-evident; and it is well deserved.

As to me, the hope remains. I am a pessimist; but at the same time can immensely enjoy that which is good, great, and grand. Optimists may hold that everything is good, and for the best; that all results are for the same end; but can they prove it? Those who are supplied, happy, and contented, hav of course a cause of happiness; but those who are conditioned the reverse hav the greater cause for complaint. In fact, all efforts at mending, at reforming, contradict the last, and giv consent to the first.

But whether the truth ever comes uppermost and ever is justice done, is a question with me. When the injury is had, the pain suffered, a life spent in vain, a nature destroyed or deformed through the lie, the false, where the justice done to the being comes in, I do not see.

Truth is that which we need. It alone is that which helps. All honest truth seekers aim to find it.

AUG. H. KRUGER.

J. HACKER TO R. GUNTHER.

BERLIN, N. J., June 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: While confined to my bed by sickness, and glancing over the papers so kindly sent me by you and otber Liberal publishers, I noticed in your issue of May 19th the following paragraph from R. Gunther, viz.: "I am sorry to learn that J. Hacker is so full of things not worth knowing."

Seventy years ago I commenced writing for the first juvenil paper I ever saw, and hav written more or less for various papers ever since. I published a paper of my own about seventeen years. I lectured much of the time from sixty-five years down to twenty years ago. And now to be told, when on a sick-bed and near the close of a long and busy life, that I am full of things not worth knowing, is rather more than I am willing to accept without proof, or to pass unnoticed as long as I can move pen or tongue; and the object of this note is to ask my accuser to point out auy and every thing he can find in my writings not worth knowing, and let him do it at once.

Let him read my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 3d, and tell me what there is in that that is not worth knowing.

I would also ask if there is any reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER in California who will be kind enough to tell me who and what this R. Gunther is. I want to get at the cause of this abuse. What is his occupation? How much land does he own or claim? How many landless men does he employ? This or any other information that may hav been the cause of this abuse will be gratefully received.

Yours, J. HAOKER.

CONOORD, N. C., June 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I had quite a heated controversy with an elder of the Presbyterian church in this town, a man of seventy-seven years, who has held county office of one kind or another two-thirds of the time in the last forty years. He voted against me for register of deeds in 1884, and voted for a man thirty years old—a man who had been in office six years, a man who knew nothing of the sufferings and hardships of 1861-5, a man worth then $5,000, and a man who never did anything for his state, county, or the party that put him in office. I am a cripple, and hav been all my life. My Christian friend and elder is worth $50,000; believes in the superstitions and myths of the Bible, and supports the lazy ministers of the gospel as they rehash on the Sabbaths their vile religious teachings. My religious friend would like to see me go to hell and Christians enjoy fat offices ad infinitum. He would, if in his power, disfranchise me from voting. He is a fair sample of the Christianity (persecution) of to-day. His age did not protect him in my remarks, though I used no abusiv language. I told my friend that had I served a term in the penitentiary for theft the Christians of this county could not hav acted more bitterly toward me—a fact. The present register of deeds is serving his tenth year. In 1884 he said (he is a member of the Lutheran church, and an officer in that church): "I want the office only one more term, and will not offer again." In 1886 he was a candidate, and elected. He is a candidate in 1888, notwithstanding his Christian promises of 1884. He helps the church and helps to keep up a lazy army of salaried sky-pilots, who work so hard that they need rest in the warm summer months, which they find in a trip to Europe or some fashionable watering-place. I would not support these lazy drones, and as a punishment the Christians of this county refused to elect me register of deeds. The sky-pilot and his wife, the register of deeds and his wife, can go to the springs, and I can go to the devil and my wife to the wash-tub. It is time for Noah to build another ark. It will be needed before 1900. J. W. MEHAFFEY.

STURGIS, MICH., June 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mongo, La Grange Co., Ind., possesses neither railroad nor religion. It has a saloon, but no drunkards; and a church building, without a congregation. The people are Freethinking and friendly. There are philosophers there, but no saints; morality, but no sanctity; and a stranger is not suspected of being a blackleg or a horse-thief, but is received as a human being should be by a civilized community. They don't seem to care whether he was baptised in infancy or old age, or whether he had been dipped or sprinkled, or how many times he was "immersed," or whether backward or forward, or if the officiating clergyman was "duly ordained." Indeed, the Mongo people seem strangely oblivious of such things.

Few tears are shed in Mongo, but there is much laughter there. Jealousies and heart-burnings, "envy, hatred, and malice, and all uncharitableness," are non est; the folks in that town don't seem to hav experienced religion. It is not a locality where gods or devils love to dwell, and angels seldom put in an appearance, except the ones without wings, like your humble servant. The people of Mongo seek salvation by good works, such as hoeing potatoes and driving nails with a hammer. Vicarious atonement seems to be unknown or unappreciated, and the blood of the lamb is all dried up. But when they hav leisure they roll in the grass and enjoy a romp with a big dog, or stroke down the soft fur of a fat pussy-cat. Yet they are energetic in business, and emphatic in expression—they hav dammed the river for practical purposes, and often insert "damns" into their language to clinch an argument.

Men or women seeking the peaceable enjoyment of life, without its passion and hurry-skurry, would do well to visit Mongo. Contentment and peace, the prime qualities which people hope to find in heaven, can be found in Mongo without going so far from home; and it has this additional advantage, that they won't be required to associate with "converted sinners," "reformed drunkards," or preachers redeemed from sin and iniquity. It is a place where women and virtue are safe from lust and hypocrisy.

It is true that people there don't "say grace before meat," but they hav enough to eat; and, what seems curious, they can sleep on their beds at night without having first committed themselvs to the care of their heavenly father, by offering the evening sacrifice of family prayer and "reading a chapter."

There are no monopolists there, either, nor money-kings, nor penniless beggars, but each individual looks to No. 1, and asks no odds of anyone. Nor are there any banks there; nor is money loaned out from one neighbor to another at a devilishly pious rate of interest. The Mongonians don't put "sugar-a-candy" in their shoes to make them creak in a highly respectable and theological manner, nor wear religiously white neckties. They are not that kind of men. They never indulge in fashionable apparel, and the women don't turn up their noses at a calico dress. They array themselvs neatly and becomingly, not extravagantly. Their "love of a bonnet" costs less than $50, and their bustles are not too big.

And besides all this, the noted philosophers and truth seekers "Nat" Reed and Squire Smith liv there, and "Flem" Hopkins isn't far off.

'Pon my sacred honor, I rather like the "unholy" town of Mongo! THOS. HARDING.

NEW BEDFORD, PA., June 16, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Remsburg has come and gone. He gave us "False Claims." The churches, as usual, all held some kind of "divine" service on that evening to prevent their enslaved victims from attending our meeting, boycott and slander being the only weapons used by the church in this vicinity.

I hav been considerably interested in what you and others hav written with regard to Talmage's "Infidel" sermon. I cannot regard either it or Talmage as a "joke." I look upon that sermon as one of the most contemptible and infamous productions of the American pulpit in the nineteenth century. But, however ridiculous it may appear to us, so long as it is listened to by applauding thousands, published in scores of leading newspapers, and read by approving millions of our fellow-citizens, it is a practical and serious matter. The effect of such preaching in the past was to crowd Christendom full of inquisitorial horrors, which was certainly no joke to the victims. It reminds me of the letter of Galileo to Kepler, in which he refers to the "roars of laughter" they would hav when they met, at the Talmagian bigots, tyrants, and fools of their day. But when he found himself a chained captiv in an inquisitorial dungeon, with a fair prospect of torture and death for heresy, it knocked the fun, the joke, and the roars of laughter pretty much out of the situation. Talmage represents a powerful, wily, wealthy, unscrupulous, and thoroughly organized enemy of liberty and progress. He represents the spirit and the power that burnt Bruno, murdered Lovejoy, and imprisoned Bennett. To these and a thousand other victims of Talmagian Christian intolerance and cowardly and brutal hate it was no joke. Thirty-three years ago I was arrested and fined for harvesting on Sunday. I saw no great fun in it. This infernal spirit more than all else threatens the destruction of our liberties. Talmage ought to be challenged both by our editors and lecturers to make good his assertions and defend his positions and calumnious and slanderous utterances in oral debate or with the pen, and if he refuses he ought to be branded as a coward, and buried under the just and righteous scorn and contempt of the thinking community. Either his doctrins and spirit must be crushed or they will crush out our liberties.

GIBBON'S HISTORY.

ORANGE, MASS., July 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: To those who are unacquainted with Roman history, especially ecclesiastical, these few excerpts may prove advantageous, and direct their attention to a field of knowledge in which no Liberal, desirous of storing his intellect, can afford to remain uninformed. Liberals should read not only the famous fifteenth and sixteenth chapters, but the whole works, as these excerpts taken from different parts demonstrate: "Whenever the spirit of fanaticism, at once so credulous and so crafty, has insinuated itself into a noble mind, it insensibly corrodes the vital principle of virtue and veracity." "In every age the absence of genuin inspiration is supplied by the strong illusions of enthusiasm, and the mimic arts of imposture." In describing the character of Jovian, who succeeded the immortal Julian during the invasion of Persia, he says: "In the obscure freedom of a private station, he indulged his taste for wine and women, yet he supported, with credit, the character of a Christian and a soldier," an expression of the profoundest scorn and contempt.

In referring to the manner by which the Catholic church acquired such enormous power and influence, he says: "The immense fortunes of the Roman ladies were gradually consumed in lavish alms and expensiv pilgrimages, and the artful monk, who had assigned himself the first, or possibly the sole place in the testament of his spiritual daughter, still presumed to declare, with the smooth face of hypocrisy, that he was only the instrument of charity, and the steward of the poor."

Referring to the decline of the arts, especially that of architecture, speaking of the monks and Christians who had retired to a secluded life in the forests or deserts of Africa and Asia, he says: "In almost every province of the Roman world an army of fanatics, without authority and without disciplin, invaded the peaceful inhabitants, and the ruin of the fairest structures of antiquity still displays the ravages of those barbarians, who alone had time and inclination to execute such laborious destruction."

Turning from religious controversy to natural philosophy, he sagaciously remarks: "The different characters that mark the civilized nations of the globe may be ascribed to the use and the abuse of reason, which so variously shapes and so artificially composes the manners and opinions of a European or a Chinese. But the operation of instincts is more sure and simple than that of reason. It is much easier to ascertain the appetites of a quadruped than the speculations of a philosopher, and the savage tribes of mankind, as they approach nearer to the condition of animals, preserve a stronger resemblance to themselvs and to each other. The uniform stability of their manners is the natural consequence of the imperfection of their faculties. Reduced to a similar situation, their wants, their desires, their enjoyments, still continue the same, and the influence of food or climate, which, in a more improved state of society, is suspended or subdued by so many moral causes, most powerfully contributes to form and to maintain the national character of barbarians." H. W. HAMMOND.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., June 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Allen McLin, the person referred to in the following article from the Kalamazoo Telegraph, has been for several years a subscriber and admirer of your paper, although a Spiritualist, as many of your subscribers are. The son spoken of is a modest, unassuming man of unblemished character. L. S. BURNICK.

Sunday, June 17th, there was held a grove meeting in Parsons's Grove, a short distance west of the Texas Grange Hall, in Kalamazoo county, under the auspices of the Southwestern Michigan Spiritualist Society, L S Burdick, president. Charles A. Andrus and L V. Moulton, both of Grand Rapids, were the speakers. Miss Lora Birchard presided at the organ and sang. The little Harris sisters (twins, ten years old) were also present, and sang some of their pretty songs. The occasion was also enlivened by the Texas Cornet Band. The weather was warm, but otherwise it was a beautiful summer day. There were about five hundred people present, some from Paw Paw, Benton Harbor, South Haven, Decatur, Kalamazoo, Vicksburg, Schoolcraft, and other places. The afternoon exercises were shortened a little for the purpose of attending the funeral of Allen McLin, an old resident in that vicinity, a pioneer Spiritualist and Liberal, who passed away on the preceding Friday, after making all arrangements for his funeral, giving particular directions in regard to details, and especially instructing the family that there should be no conforming in any respect to beliefs and ceremonies that he had rejected. His wishes were carried out. The band was instructed to play lively music. Miss Birchard played the organ and sang some appropriate songs. The little Harris girls also gave one of their songs. Mr. Moulton delivered the address; Mr. Andrus an inspirational poem, and the procession moved to the cemetery accompanied by the band discoursing lively music. Mr. Andrus made a few appropriate closing remarks after the body was lowered, the band struck up a lively air, when suddenly a son of the deceased was overpowered by the spirit of the departed and compelled to execute a graceful dance in time with the music, to the great surprise and astonishment of all present. When the music ceased, the medium executed a bow in the peculiar style of the old gentleman and recovered consciousness.

Mr. McLin had been for many years opposed to orthodox theology, and had become well acquainted with the philosophy of Spiritualism. He had often said that he would dance at his own funeral if possible to do so, as he thought it quite as appropriate as to pray. He had a habit of dancing his approval of anything that pleased him, and had peculiar tips and gestures, which were not common to the son in his normal condition, and were readily recognized by those present who were acquainted with the deceased. Of course some will be horribly shocked, but the proceedings from beginning to end were strictly in accord with Mr. McLin's wishes, and those in sympathy with his belief can have the satisfaction of knowing that, however ridiculous and profane it might appear to some, there was no conforming to popular prejudice or custom on this particular occasion, contrary to the desires of the departed, as is sometimes the case.

LARAMIE, WYO., June 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I prize the work THE TRUTH SEEKER is accomplishing for the overthrow of religious or Christian fraud, and shall never fail in effort to enlarge its circulation. I am of the non-Christian family of Spiritualists. Your treatment of Spiritualism is fair, just, and altogether satisfactory to me. The four recent statements of Wm. Henry Burr, detailing in his characteristic, concise, and candid manner the results of his recent interviews with the mediums, should have weight with Materialists, not excepting Mrs. Slenker. My first acquaintance with "Antichrist" dates back more than thirty years. I have never failed to read all that came under my notice from his pen. Judge, then, of the interest I take in him since his new basis for the acquirement of knowledge. I trust, also, Elmina will be encouraged to make another effort, for her earnest entreaties that Mr. Burr should be thorough in his investigations, and guard against fraud, afford added evidence of her integrity. A. B. Bradford is another whose communications to THE TRUTH SEEKER have always given me satisfaction. I have just read his book, "A Visit to Cassadaga Lake," a complete exposé of the character of the "Seybert commission."

There are many among our strong Liberal propaganda I should have sooner looked to as probable converts to the beautiful science and philosophy of Spiritualism than Burr and Bradford. True, the latter does not fully commit himself. For myself, I deny that Spiritualism is in any sense a religion, but only a science and philosophy. But for the wretched uses to which religion has been put, there would be less objection to including the term in its title.

The word "religion" suggests, primarily, the idea of worship. For man to worship anything is degrading, ignoble. To admire whatever is truth is noble and elevating in man.

If there is a personality the religious worshipers call God, we are certainly gods in miniature, and in worshiping him we but worship ourselves, as units of a mutual admiration society. Our spirit friends are just like ourselves. Therefore they do not want our worship. They feel and manifest the same gratitude for our efforts in recognizing their visits to us that we feel because of those visits. All manifestation from them is in obedience to law, never superseding law.

The manifestation is never surprising or wonderful save to the novice. Now, while great numbers cannot accept the claims of Spiritualism for want of evidence, why should there be any alienation between the Spiritualist and Materialist wings of Liberalism? Both seek defense against every encroachment on the rights of man. The encroaching party is organized and powerful. Not powerful by virtue of innate strength, but simply because it has put a mortgage on every man, woman, and child in the land not endowed by nature with a stiff vertebræ. The politician—men in all the professions, in all the business of the country, and especially the press, all but the stiff-backed—know of this mortgage, and that foreclosure proceedings will be commenced whenever they cease support of their organized fraud.

VINTON, IA., June 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry to hav to chronicle the death of a dear friend and a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years, Mr. Wilson. He died, as he had lived, a true and good man. By the inclosed find how highly he was esteemed, notwithstanding his Radicalism—which, I assure you, was never hidden, but he was always an outspoken Freethinker. And I know he was much more esteemed for his outspoken independence than any truckling moral coward ever is.

M. BRANIN.

DIED.—In Vinton, Ia., Thursday, June 7, 1888, George Wilson, aged sixty years.

Our departed friend, husband, and father, George Wilson, was born in Scotland, May 26, 1828. He was married to Emma Hunt, in July, 1857. This union was blessed with six children three of whom, together with his beloved wife, remain to mourn their great loss, three having preceded him to the life beyond. Mr. Wilson removed from Scotland to London, Eng., in 1851, in which city he resided for many years. In 1876, with his family, he came to this country and located in Vinton, spending here the residue of his days.

In the character of our departed friend there were many most excellent features. Though not a churchman, in the sense of being a member of any of the denominations, he had a reverence and respect for every high and noble quality in human character and life, and exemplified many of them in his own. He was a devoted husband and affectionate parent, much attached to his home, employing his talent and devoting his labors to the purpose of promoting its comforts and happiness. In his professional calling he was a master, bringing into requisition in his daily business a skill, a taste, and a genius rarely excelled. To his employer he was a valued assistant, and his loss as a friend and helper is sincerely mourned. His place, in all respects, it is probable can never be filled. The wife is left a widow, the children fatherless, the business circle has lost an important adjunct, the community a valued citizen, and all of us a kind friend and a good neighbor. While we sympathize with his bereaved family and mourn his departure from our midst, let us copy his virtues and imitate his every noble quality.

The respect and esteem of the "London Zinc Workers' Society," of which for years Mr. Wilson was the honored treasurer, is thoroughly indicated by the following paper, which was accompanied with a fine gold watch worth $150:

Presented by the members of the London Zinc Workers' Society, in addition to a grant to the Trade Testimonial Fund, to Mr. George Wilson, upon his leaving this country for America, as a mark of their esteem for his faithful membership of the above society, and long service as its treasurer, etc., and as a token of their recognition of and admiration for his wise counsel, candor, and courtesy, and ever-persistent endeavors to promote the welfare of the zinc trade and all engaged in it, by doing and inciting to good workmanship, and his cheerful readiness to impart his large practical and theoretical knowledge to those needing advice and assistance. Though we regret parting with a valued friend, we hope that our loss will be his gain, and that he may succeed in his new enterprise; that he and his family may enjoy health and happiness in their new home, and that he may long pursue his honorable career to his own advantage and to the benefit of his fellow-men. (Signed) JOHN BRADLEY, Pres.

GIDEON, KAN., June 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say a few words in your valuable paper in regard to Liberalism. We are all Liberal in a certain way, and Liberals to a certain extent; but that extent is very limited with many persons. They are Liberal enough in their views and conversation on certain subjects, but somewhat restricted in their Liberalism on others. I think we should strive to be, one and all, Freethinking Liberals of the most advanced and pronounced type. We may not all reach the top step of the Liberal stair, but we can progress to a much higher step than many of us are on at present.

It has been said that women, or the majority of them, are not sufficiently advanced in Liberalism, and that they adhere to the orthodox creed and the church too erroneously to have the right to vote and to have equal rights with men in general; and I am sorry to say it is true, and a great number of the so-called lords of creation are in the same position.

If I believed in a man God, I would want one which was more intelligent and could dictate a better book than the holy Bible, which places woman simply as a slave. Should we believe such a book? I say No, emphatically No. Let us illumin our minds with that bright light, intelligence. We know that there are women who are truly called exceptions, many who equal some of the most stalwart Liberal men and excel many men in their Liberal views; and we of aspiring Liberal minds can, through education, investigation, and perseverance, advance until we become one of those exceptions. We can at least try. It is better to aim high, if we do miss the mark, than to remain in a state of half-way Liberalism.

Father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a number of years. And although we were compelled to go without our much-prized Sunday go-to-meeting bonnets, he would still find change in some way to pay for his favorit paper. I like the cartoons; they are instructiv. I like the "Letters from Friends." They show intelligence, and that universal mental liberty is spreading, as one by one new beginners take the courage to contribute to that paper of education. I, for one, believe that there should be no limit whatever to the interchange of thought. LILAH C. WATKINS.

MR. EDITOR: I am gratified to recognize that you are a Liberal in fact, and prove your principles by publishing both sides of the question of Spiritualism, pro and con. I have been more or less interested in the question ever since it made its advent with the Fox family, and I have read everything for and against that I could obtain, and witnessed some strange events which I cannot account for; and as I am an Agnostic, I do not believe or disbelieve, for I do not know. And after I relate a few of the events, I would be pleased to have Aunt Elmina, or some who are so positiv in their conclusions that we are humbugged by the mediums, account for them. In giving an account of what I have seen and heard, I will be as brief as possible, and give the items of three séances. It is over forty years since I first became acquainted with the phenomena, and every opportunity that has been offered I have improved, to learn more of the mystery. A séance which convened at the residence of one of our city editors, numbering about twelve persons, female and male, was held in a room about fourteen by sixteen feet, with two doors, one opening on a hall, the other in a kitchen. We had one guitar, a violin, and a small bell. We formed our circle, all taking hold of hands around the room. The medium, by the name of Search, was in the center, sitting in a chair. The guitar, fiddle, and bell were laid on the laps of the different members of the circle. The lights were turned down to total darkness, and after our singing some pieces, to form an equilibrium of mind, the instruments were taken from the laps of the parties having them up in the room over our heads; music vibrated on them, and the bell was up tinkling over our heads also. Simultaneously a number of us felt soft touches on our arms, backs, and heads. After this continuing for half an hour, the lights were turned up, and all was quiet. I forgot to mention that the guitar and fiddle vibrated answers to questions by one, two, and three sounds, when they were in motion overhead. The next act of the séance was to construct a cabinet across the corner of the room, which was plastered. The cabinet was formed by blankets or quilts, fastened up about seven feet from the floor, about four feet from the corner, and about eight feet from right to left, where they were attached to the walls of the room. No doors or windows opened into this cabinet. It was constructed with lights turned up, in full view of all present. In it was an aperture in the center about four and one-half feet from the floor. As your humble servant was the only Materialist present, the medium conferred on me the honor of sitting with him, close to the outside of the cabinet, with a blanket covered close up to our chins, his right hand on my knee and my left firmly pressed on his right. We sat in the center of the cabinet, with the opening over our heads. The light was turned so we could see all persons and objects in the room. After some vocal music, members of the circle claimed that they saw persons' hands put out of the aperture over the heads of medium and self, and it excited my curiosity. I turned my eyes up sidewise to the opening and kept my mind concentrated on the medium's position, with his right hand on my knee and my left pressed on his, for I wanted to detect collusion if there was any. I saw four or five hands, at different times, of different sizes, run out of the cabinet. Finally some one asked if they wanted a guitar inside of the cabinet. The answer was in the affirmativ, by the usual number of raps. It was put in through the opening and was taken, and tones vibrated on the strings. Finally it was thrust out of the cabinet near my right arm, with the finger-board ahead, and the strings vibrated until the whole was out. During the time I sat against the cabinet I felt a continued succession of raps on the back of my head, shoulder, and arms.

Séance No. 2 was held at the residence of the writer, in a room fourteen by fourteen feet, ceiling eight feet high, all lathed and plastered. The dark circle was composed of about fourteen, male and female, with two guitars, a violin, and a small bell on the laps of the members of the circle. The medium was in the center. The instruments were all taken up over our heads, and the strings vibrated and answered questions, the fiddle played some tunes, and the bell tinkled; and at my request there were marks made on the ceiling overhead with the instruments, four or five in number, some of them four feet long. We could hear them distinctly. We all felt raps on our heads and arms simultaneously. I could not sing as melodiously as the balance of the circle, and the force that was handling the instrument requested me by raps not to sing, but I persisted; finally, a guitar came down and turned up against my mouth, and I did not again interrupt with my discordant sounds. The medium said he saw a person standing behind Mrs. Brown, and gave a description of him and said he was murdered; which was correct. He was shot at Chattanooga, Tenn., by a man by the name of Taylor. A number of other incidents took place during our dark circle, but space compels me to be brief. Our cabinet circle was about like the one preceding this at the editor's.

Séance No. 3 convened at the residence of Mr. Swan, in a room about fourteen by fourteen feet, with a stove, and a pipe entering the ceiling overhead about two feet from the side wall. Our dark circle was formed of equal numbers of males and females, and we were compelled to take the stove and pipe inside of the circle. I sat one side of the stove and Mrs. Swan at the other end. We joined hands between the wall of the room and the stovepipe. The medium was in the center. The guitars, violins, and bells were placed in the same position as in our previous circles. The results were about the same, except one incident, and that was that the instruments of music and the bell passed between the stovepipe and the wall of the house, which proves to my mind that, as the medium could not pass them between the stovepipe and house without coming in contact with the pipe, there was no collusion on the part of the medium in that event. Our cabinet sitting was about the same as our former one. Likewise the exhibitions of hands and arms, as were all of the six séances which were held with this medium. The men paid him fifty cents each. And as to the cause of those events that transpired during our six séances deponent saith not, for I do not know. I am satisfied that it was not the medium, and that he did not have a confederate; and that it was not any member of the circle, for I was acquainted with all of them. And as for its being electricity or mesmerism, as the wiseacres say, I have read and have some experience in those sciences, and know that it is a mistake. And I am satisfied that there was no jugglery in the performance. Now I will say to Elmina and Mr. Winter, positiv opponents, if it is not spirits, what is it? For there is an intelligent force exhibited in these phenomena. I well remember the priesthood and their devotees ignored mesmerism, and now they are forced by the advent of Spiritualism to acknowledge the truth of this science and offer it as a cause of the Spiritism which is making such inroads in their churches and spreading skepticism among their membership.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Children Go A-Boating.

Come, little children, go with me—
The sweetest winds are blowing;
We'll seek an island in the sea
Where golden fruits are growing.
The cocoa-nut and mangosteen
Are waiting for your fingers,
And bread-fruit in i's husk of green,
Where mellow sunlight lingers.

The boats are drifting; let us haste—
Come, Patrick, Nell, and Neddy,
We've not a moment now to waste—
We need not be too steady.
Pray, don't forget a shawl and coat,
You careless Carl and Tilly,
For sailing in an ocean boat
The mornings may be chilly.

I see a leaping, flying pair—
It must be Ted and Danny—
And, oh! that girl with golden hair
I know is Cousin Fanny.
We'll gather in the cool, green wood
The red and purple berries;
Our shouts shall wake the solitude
While throwing down the cherries.

What's that you say? "Poor Dick is ill!"
Oh, dear, 'tis such a pity!
A basket from the wood we'll fill,
And send to him by Kitty.
Let's each remember those at home—
A lonely friend or neighbor—
Some woodland treasure as we roam,
Love will not heed the labor.

With joy and song we speed along—
How swift the boats are going!
The ocean breeze is fresh and strong,
The dappled waves are flowing.
I hope you do not mind the noise,
The overflowing laughter,
Of all these happy boys and girls—
'Tis oxygen we're after.

Breakers.

In order to clearly understand the meaning of the term breaker, let us imagin we are in a gulf or ocean during or after a wind storm. We see waves coming which appear like perpendicular walls. They reach shallow water, which retards their bases, while their crests move on, and with tremendous force curl and break, causing the roaring and dashing to which one must become accustomed before many days at sea.

Once while sailing my attention was suddenly drawn by a most beautiful scene, occasioned by the phosphorescence of the sea. At one side I could hear the roaring and see the breaking of the waves; at the other, waves were coming from the deep sea, with their crests all aglow with lurid flames. Darwin describes this better than I can, so I shall quote his words. His description can be applied to almost any place. I shall, there fore, change his word "La Plata" to "gulf of Mexico:"

"While sailing on the gulf of Mexico on one very dark night, the sea presented a wonderful and most beautiful spectacle. There was a fresh breeze, and every part of the surface, which during the day is seen as foam, now glowed with a pale light. The vessel drove before her bow two billows of liquid phosphorus, and in her wake she was followed by a milky train. As far as the eye reached, the crest of every wave was bright, and the sky above the horizon was illumined from the reflected glare of these lurid flames. While among the breakers—though at times the water ran over the deck of our craft—we were so fascinated by the splendor of the scene that we failed to realize danger."

From this I hope the reader will comprehend the meaning of the broad and suggestiv word "breaker." T. P. BRINEGAR.

Correspondence.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., June 23, 288.

MISS WIXON, My Dear Friend: In thinking of your delightful summer trips to Onset Bay, the lines which I inclose suggested themselvs to my mind. How much I wish I could be with you—though I am often in thought and spirit, i. e., if we hav spirits, which I hope we hav.

Let us thank you for your good lecture, which I read in the Investigator, and for the pleasure its perusal afforded me. If our children could only hear such inspiring words every Sunday instead of the cumbersome sermons, which, in reality, are nothing but twaddle! Husband and I never go to hear them, but the young folks wanting to see the outside world must go to church or nowhere. I hope you may hav strength to tell the world "where to begin" for many years yet. Your Children's Corner, with its steady improvement, tells the outlay of time, toil, and patience spent upon it. I sent Laura's little letter to her for a birthday (which is to-day) present. She writes to us every week, and composes her own letters.

Wishing you abundant success in all your work, I am,

Your sincere friend, MARY B. FINCH.

OCALA, FLA., June 13, 1888.

MISS SUSAN WIXON: By your permission I propose to tell the children somethiug about God. Children, you hav all heard there was a something, not to be described, not understood, called God. But the question is, Does he exist? The smart men say that they can find no reason why he should. They say that nature is capable of existing by the force within her. Preachers then say "this inner force is God." "No," says science, "power or force is the result of a natural law, and this law is eternal—without beginning." Human science confesses that there are some things it cannot explain, because humanity is not old enough. It is like a school-girl—to her mind philosophy is something grand, awful, only to be studied by the largest scholars. When she comes to be one of these large scholars there is nothing great about it. So with science and God, we of to-day represent the wee boys and girls, we cannot exactly understand the fact that nature can control herself. We, like the school-boy, must hav a great big nothing to be afraid of. When the race grows older, when we hav reached the senior class in the school of nature, we will see at once that there can be no God to create matter, for matter never was created. So it is as old as God. But if, by the operation of some law that we know nothing of, a God does exist, we are not, cannot be, under any obligations to him. He cannot forgiv an act of immorality you commit, for if you say of your playmate, "He is a bad boy," when he is not, you hav not only done him a wrong, but you hav done the whole human family a wrong. You hav done him a wrong because somebody might hav been intending to take the little fellow into his business, but your cruel slander came and his prospects were ruined. You hav done the race a wrong because you hav given just a little foundation to that cruel lie said by the church, that you yourself are naturally mean. Read the Bible carefully and you will see that every page is a threat, every line a curse, and every letter a slander on your mother and sister. If there was a God, every breeze would murmur his name, every bird-song would be a carol of praise, every note of music would be an anthem of glory. But our smartest men hav searched everywhere, in every star, every drop of water, every ray of light, and naught has been found but a tribute to the glory of man. Every musical note that flows from the throat of your sister is a proof that nature is god.

Next time, if Miss Susan is willing, I shall tell you something about immortality.

R. E. TOUNSLEY.

Temperance Boys and Girls.

I wish to giv three reasons why all these boys and girls ought to be on the side of temperance. First, because they know enough about the evils of rum and the meaning of the pledge. Some one who thought boys and girls ought not to sign the pledge asked a little boy, "What does the word 'drunk' mean?" He answered, "Getting crazy on purpose." Then he asked, "What does 'pledge' mean?" He answered, "To promis something, and then stick to it." The man saw the boy understood it, and so he let him sign the pledge and work for temperance. The second reason that I want the boys and girls on the side of temperance is, because men by and by will be in character what we get the boys to be now. Bad boys will probably be bad men, and good boys good men. In France, when wicked tyrants were kings, some of the boys had a Band of Hope, and when they marched they had on their flags the words: "Tremble, tyrants, we shall grow up." They intended to drive the wicked rulers out of the country when they were men. So temperance boys can say: "Tremble, intemperance and rum-selling, we shall grow up and put a stop to it." The third reason is because everybody can do something to help the cause of temperance—even the boys and girls. If there were only two temperance people in the world to-day, and each of them should get one more every year to work for temperance, and each of these new temperance people one more every year, it wouldn't be thirty years before all the people in the world would be on the side of temperance. Let us all sign the pledge and keep it, and get everybody else we can to let rum entirely alone.

A REWARD OF MERIT.—"Sam," said one little urchin to another, the other day, "Sam, does your schoolmaster ever giv you any rewards of merit?" "I s'pose he does," was the rejoinder; "he givs me a lickin' every day, and says I merits two."

Our Barefoot Boys.

Mr. Matthew Arnold was greatly struck, says the Boston Herald, by the democratic government of our reading-rooms when in Boston. He entered a reading-room one day, and saw a small, barefooted newsboy sitting in one of the best chairs, enjoying himself to the utmost. The great essayist was amazed, and asked: "Do you let barefooted boys in this reading-room? You will never see such a sight as that in Europe. I do not believe there is a reading-room in all Europe in which that boy, dressed as he is, could enter."

Then Mr. Arnold went over to the boy, engaged him in conversation, and found that he was reading the "Life of Washington," and that he was a young gentleman of decidedly anti-British tendencies, and, for his age, remarkably well informed.

Mr. Arnold remained talking with the youngster for some time, and as he came away he said:

"I do not think I hav been so impressed with anything else that I hav seen since arriving in this country as I am now with meeting this barefooted boy in this reading-room. What a tribute to democratic institutions it is to say that, instead of sending that boy out to wander alone in the streets, they permit him to come in here and excite his youthful imagination by reading such books as the 'Life of Washington!' The reading of that one book may change the whole course of that boy's life, and may be the means of making him a useful, honorable, worthy citizen of this great country. It is, I tell you, a sight that impresses a European not accustomed to your democratic ways."

Profane Jokes.

"Ma," said an inquisitiv little girl, "will rich and poor folks liv together when they go to heaven?" "Yes, my dear, they will be all alike there." "Then, ma, why don't rich and poor Christians associate together here?" The mother did not answer.

It is related that the bishop of Carlisle, when on a visitation, stopped one day at a parsonage. The parson and his wife "my lorded" him every word, while their young hopeful, a boy of five, watched the black apron and gaiters with a mouth like a teacup. At the dinner-table the "my lording" business was kept up hotter than ever, till, in a pause, young hopeful whispered audibly, "My Lord God almighty wants another potato." Tableau!

"The delivery-boy had gone a little ahead of me," said the canvasser, "and as I stood on the sidewalk a pretty little boy in kilts toddled up and stared at me with pretty blue eyes. I made friends with him at once. He put his hands on my order-book and says he: 'Hot's at?' 'That's my order book,' I told him. 'Hot does oo do wiv at?' 'Oh, I write down the names of all the bad little boys I know.' He looked at me a minute, with his big eyes opened wide; then, his voice hushed with awe, he asked, 'Is oo Dod?'"

"You bad boy to fight!" said Mrs. Brown to an urchin in her Sunday-school class, whose face was adorned with a black eye. "Satan will hav you if you don't learn to love your henemies." "Why, the Bible tells us to fight," said the youthful pugilist. "Nonsense," said the lady, who was rather fond of misplacing her h's, "where is there any such a horder given?" "Well, ma'am, you hav sometimes read to us the words, 'Hit 'is eye, be not afraid,'" rejoined the young member of the church militant, with a sly grin.—London Freethinker.

Fun and Fancy.

CORRECT.—Teacher: "So you can't do a simple sum in arithmetic? Now let me explain it to you. Suppose 8 of you hav together 48 apples, 32 peaches, and 16 melons, what would each of you get?" "Cholera morbus," replied Johnny.

"EDWARD, why do I hear that you hav disobeyed your grandmother, who told you just now not to jump down those steps?" "Grandma didn't tell me not to, papa. She only came to the door and said, 'I wouldn't jump down these steps, boys.' And, papa, I shouldn't think she would—an old lady like her."

MRS. PENN: "William, I read an advertisment in one of the papers stating that for a dollar in stamps the advertiser would send by return mail a sure way to get rid of the rats in the house." Mr. Penn: "Well?" Mrs. Penn: "I sent a dollar in stamps, William, and received an answer." Mr. Penn: "What was it?" Mrs. Penn: "William, the old cheat told me to move."

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.
The Present and the Future Republic of North America.
BY A CAPITALIST.
A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by Selections.

Christianity in Texas.

Hev ye hearn about the duel in Cow-Lick Holler, Josh?
They say 'twar quite excitin' like—ther shootin' fine, b'gosh!
Ther fracas war a "stand-up" atween them Dutch galoots;
An' all the boys war slick on hand, ye bet yer yaller boots.

The challenge it war given o' Sunday in the shed
Whar Parson Bucks war preachin' an' bobbin' his bald head.
Hans Zweitzerkase gev Pretzel some name like Sauerkraut;
An' Pretzel says, "Gott! himmel!" an' calls his rival out.

At five o' Monday morning the boys wur on the ground,
An' fust-row seats wuz sellin' at prices fat 'en round;
The audjence war a-waitin' for the circus to begin,
An' bets wuz tuck and offered, 'ith odds on who 'ud win.

Ole Boggs an' Colonel Principle wuz slingin' ail the style,
An' pacin' off the distance with a weird don't-touch-me smile;
They wuz handlin' the shooters, and a-rammin' down the wads,
An' a-lookin' high an' mighty like a pair of heathen gods.

An' Parson Binks war standin' with a sermon in his hand,
All ready fer to preach it when the victim bit the sand.
Josh, he hed the look o' angels in the corner o' his eye,
An' wuz doin' holy horror with an amen sort o' sigh.

At last Jim Gleason hollers, "The dewelists is come!"
We looked, an' cuss my peepers ef we wuzn't all struck dumb!
Fer the costume thet they sported war the durn'dest lookin' thing
This bloomin' yairth hez witnessed since fig-leaf suits fer spring.

Both men wur fixed with breast-plates like mattresses o' hair,
An' ther neck war round with paddin' so's jest ther chin wuz bare;
Ther arms wuz out, but covered with a quilted chammy skin,
An' dark-green iron goggles shut both ther eyelids in.

"The hell!" sez Boggs, "is this yer thing a Prussian dress parade?
Is Dutchmen at a premium? Does Texas choose the blade?
Yer won't take shootin' irons? Ye're skeered? Ye both say No?
What, boys? Then let 'em carve 'emselvs! I giv up this yer show!"

Then the faces of that audjence showed solemn with disgust;
Some sot sarcastic silent, an' some got up an' cussed;
An' Binks, our bald-head parson, he paced a narrow path,
A-quotin' bits o' scriptur ter smother down his wrath.

At last he stopped, an' pointin' with his pavers in his hand
To them two German chromos, he sez in accents grand:
"I kem to see a shootin', an' ter order up the hearse,
Ter preach the fun'l sermon, an' ter sing a solemn verse.

"An', by the great sombrero of the Mexican Saint Ann!
I'm goin' ter do this business if I hav ter shoot ther man!
Do ye hear me? I'm a buzzard, an' my plumes are iled with paint;
I'm a carmine hue dispenser, ef I am a Christian saint."

Then Ferguson jumpt suddin' to his feet and sez:
"My friend,
You'll remember I'm a-shoutin', and I'm heeled from end to end.
I hev hearn thet once the licker here wuz stopped by your durned talk;
You wuz preachin' high o' temperance, an' drawin' lines o' chalk.

"An' ever since thet cussedness I've laid ter get yer cold,
An' now's the time, my fightin' saint, when you'll jest loose yer hold;
Fer I'll help ye on yer journey ter the land o' holy writ,
Whar I hopes ye'll find a parish and a halo that'll fit."

They say ther sight wur splendid; that both war full o' sand;
Thet Principle said "Fire" in a voice o' deep command;

A Philistine Champion.

From the Popular Science Monthly.

A certain record tells us that when the Philistine army was drawn up in front of that of Israel, a champion of great size, arrayed in portentous armor and carrying a sword and spear of enormous proportions, came forth from the Philistine ranks and challenged the Hebrews to send a man to fight with him. We read also that when David, the son of Jesse, stepped forth to the encounter, armed with a few pebbles, the huge Philistine "cursed him by his gods." Now, somehow or other, the Lord of Argyll and the Isles, who has lately stood forth, from another "Philistine" camp, to challenge the hosts of science, and, if not to curse, to indulge at least in some good Homeric loidoria, reminds us powerfully of that Goliath of Gath who had so vast a contempt for David and his pebbles, but whose strutting and boasting one of those pebbles brought to a sudden end. The duke is not a man of huge physical stature—quite the reverse people say who hav seen him—but he is armed in a panoply of multifarious knowledge, he is practiced in the use of controversial weapons, and he has the truculent tone befitting one who constitutes himself the champion of reactionary ideas, and who hopes to make bluster do to a large extent the work of argument. After assailing Professor Huxley, and with him nearly the whole body of modern men of science, in the geological field at least, on the absurd ground that they had conspired to smother a certain new theory of the origin of coral-reefs, simply because it differed from the one promulgated by Darwin, he turns his attention to Mr. Herbert Spencer, whom he represents as having made, in his "Factors of Organic Evolution," a "great confession" as to the inadequacy of the Darwinian view of the origin of species, and whom he further charges with a persistent effort to degrade philosophy to the lowest possible level. Upon both points the Philistine champion is simply as unjust to Mr. Spencer as it is possible for him to be, and this we propose to briefly show. We invite our readers, however, to turn to the pages of the Popular Science Monthly for verification of what we hav here to say; for at different times we hav published all the more important parts of the controversies now in question, including the duke of Argyll's article, "A Great Confession," in our number for May, and Mr. Spencer's "Counter Criticism" in that for June.

To make "a great confession" must mean—if it means anything—to acknowledge some serious error on one's own part. To assert the deficiencies of another man's theories is not to make a great confession or any confession. Now, Mr. Spencer's work on "The Factors of Organic Evolution," far from being a confession of error on his own part, was an attempt to fix attention upon a view of his own which he holds now, as he has done for many years, to be of much importance as a complement to the Darwinian doctrin of the origin of species. If some one who had strongly asserted the all-sufficiency of the principle of natural selection, independently of the action of the principle contended for by Mr. Spencer, that, namely, of the inheritance of functionally produced modifications of structure, had come round to Mr. Spencer's view and published a treatis similar in scope and object to his on "The Factors of Organic Evolution," that might hav been called a confession. Whether it would hav been a "great" one or not would hav depended on the writer's rank in the world of thought and the extent to which his previous views had affected scientific opinion generally. In Mr. Spencer's case there was no "confession" at all; on the contrary, there was the reaffirmation of a special view of his own, and a reenforcement of it by additional arguments.

Had our Scotch Goliath admitted the force of Mr. Spencer's arguments, in so far as they tend to show the insufficiency of the principle of natural selection, pure and simple, to account for the origin of species, it might hav been possible to explain his calling Mr. Spencer's recent work "a great confession" by assuming that, in his polemical haste and fury, he saw nothing in "The Factors of Organic Evolution" save a criticism—and a powerful one—on the doctrin of natural selection by the most distinguished of contemporary evolutionists. But, far from this being the case, the champion will not admit that there is any force in Mr. Spencer's arguments, but likens them to "some bit of Bumbledom setting up for home rule, some parochial vestry claiming independence of a universal empire." Where, then, does he find the "great confession?" How can arguments to which all force is denied be twisted into a "confession" damaging to any scientific doctrin whatsoever?

The only "confession" Mr. Spencer makes is one which he would hav made at any time during the last twenty years, and that is to the effect that his phrase, "the survival of the fittest," is susceptible of being understood in a wrong sense, if not to the same extent, at least in the same general way, as Mr. Darwin's phrase, "natural selection." This confession, however, his grace of Argyll does not gloat over. It is at this point that he accuses Mr. Spencer of trying to rob philosophy of all dignifying elements. Mr. Spencer feels that to use language asserting or implying conscious purpose or direction when there is no evidence of anything of the kind beyond the vaguest analogy, is undesirable, and if needlessly done, wrong. His grace holds, on the contrary, that any suggestion of design which we discover in nature should be treasured up and made the most of for purposes of edification. "There are," he says, "as it were, a thousand retinæ (in our brains), each set to receive its own special impressions from the external world. They are all needed, but they are not all of equal dignity. Some catch the lesser and others catch the higher lights of nature; some reflect mere numerical order or mechanical arrangement, while others are occupied with the causes and the reasons or purposes of these." This is all very nice, but a cautious person will remember that when we ascend to "causes and purposes and reasons," we do so by virtue of a faculty totally different from mere perception—a faculty of the highest possible value when its operations can be checked and its conclusions verified, but of very doubtful value when it expatiates in regions where check and verification are impossible. A hypothetical retina or facet in the brain might conceivably reflect facts or phenomena of an external order, but how another similar mirror in that organ could "reflect" a subjectiv explanation of the same facts we fail to understand. We fear there is no retina or facet in our brain that can help us in this particular difficulty. The theory of design in nature, the duke tells us, is "a higher intellectual perception." From our point of view it is not a perception of any kind; it is a synthetical judgment, as fully liable to error as any other synthetical judgment, and one that labors under the special disability of being incapable of verification.

The fact is, that it is not Mr. Spencer who degrades philosophy; it is those who seek to impose their own petty conceptions upon a universe that must ever transcend human thought. Mr. Spencer does not pretend to be able to think the thoughts of God. Men hav pretended and claimed to do this in past times—to know the why and wherefore of the divine actions both in nature and in human history. But Mr. Spencer has advanced far enough to see that to represent the ultimate power in nature as having acted thus and thus because, to our apprehension, such a mode of action might plausibly explain the facts, is at once foolish and irreverent. The duke of Argyll professes to know that a certain uncouth animal living in Madagascar was fitted by the deity with ears, teeth, a probe-like finger and a peculiar claw, all for the purpose of enabling it to feed on the larvæ concealed in certain trees. Mr. Spencer only professes to know that an animal of this form does liv on larvæ, but he does not say that he has discovered in the construction and habits of the creature a revelation of divine purpose. He refrains from such a judgment, both from a sense of the inadequacy of human faculties for discovering purposes higher than human, and because he knows by actual experience that an appearance of order and purpose is often the necessary result of purely mechanical causes. Witness, as Mr. Spencer says, the arrangement of the pebbles on Chesil beach. Mr. Spencer is as ready as anyone to recognize purpose where purpose can, without undue presumption, be traced, but he does not see how this can be done outside the sphere of human action. The very conception of purpose he finds too small, and, so to speak, too provisional, too relativ to our evanescent thought, to apply to the interpretation of nature as a whole. The duke of Argyll, by the extremely harsh and overweening tone of his several articles recently, has judged himself. If he could only be made aware of it, "a great confession" is due from him—a confession of the injustice done by him to the men of science in connection with their reception of Mr. Murray's theory of coral reefs, and the further and special injustice done to Mr. Spencer in representing his latest contribution to the theory of evolution in an altogether false light.

Wouldn't Heed Good Advice.

From the Tribune.

"How about young Baldwin, who came down here?" asked a friend from out of the city of a deacon in a prominent New York church.

"I am extremely sorry to say that Baldwin failed to make a success of it here," replied the deacon.

"Is that so?"

"Oh, yes. He lost all his property and is now peddling shoe-strings at the corner of Vesey street and Broadway."

"Indeed! I am sorry to hear it."

"Very sad, certainly—he comes of a good family. But he got drawn into Wall street speculation and lost his all."

"Ah, the maelstrom of Wall street, was it? Too bad."

"Yes, that's what I say. I tried my best to save him from it, not only because he was the son of an old schoolmate of mine, but also because I considered it my duty anyhow. My connection with the church would not permit me to look at it otherwise."

"Oh, I know of course that you would do what you could in such a case to guide a young man in the right path."

"Oh, certainly, certainly," replied the deacon in a modest tone. "I did what I could in my weak way. I went to him," continued the good man, as he wiped his spectacles and looked out of the window thoughtfully; "I went to him and says I: 'See here, George, you don't want to put your money in that Western Wind stock—the bottom is going to fall out of the whole thing inside of twenty-four hours. Just come in with me on this Consolidated stock, and if you don't clear up fifty thousand on it inside of a week, why, then I'm a liar!' But he wouldn't listen to good counsel, and went into Western Wind and dropped his pile. I suppose," went on the deacon, musingly, as he adjusted his glasses, "that I might add, by way of proof that I was right, that I put five thousand in the Consolidated myself and unloaded it on Brother Dobbs for seventeen thousand five hundred three days after. You well said, my friend, that Wall street is a terrible maelstrom."

Books the Gazetteer Has Got.

From the Denison, Texas, Sunday Gazetteer.

The Truth Seeker Publishing Company, of New York city, hav complimented the Gazetteer with copies of the following interesting pamphlets recently published by them:

"An Outline of the French Revolution: Its Causes and Results," by W. S. Bell. This is a most valuable little book, condensing a wonderful amount of history in a small space, and must hav caused the author the expenditure of a great deal of time in historical research. Price, 25 cents.

"Religious Problems," by L. K. Washburn. Christians who hav not solved the mysteries of their faith (who of them has?) will derive valuable assistance from this lecture. Price, 15 cents.

"Materialism: Its History and Its Influence upon Society," by Dr. Louis Büchner, the author of "Force and Matter," "Man and His Position in Nature," etc. This eminent scholar briefly reviews the history and progress of Materialism from the earliest historic times to the present, and its influence upon the world. The pamphlet deserves wide circulation. Price, 15 cents.

Also the following 3-cent tracts: "The Stage and the Pulpit," by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, and "Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." The revisers of the New Testament tell us the title Lord, as applied to Jesus, should never hav appeared in the English version; the true rendering is Rabbi, a teacher, a title of respect. The Hebrew name of this Jewish rabbi was Joshua; in the Greek, Jesus. Christ, from the Greek Christos, signifies wisdom. Hence Joshua Christos (Jesus Christ), saving wisdom. The author critically examins the writings of Paul where these words are used, and arrives at some very interesting results. The tract is well worth reading.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Gems of Thought.

A WHILE after was revived an old fashion, long antiquated, of embroidery with Indian figures of men, women, and children. Here the sons [the churches] had no occasion to examin the will [the scriptures]: they remembered but too well how their father had always abhorred this fashion; that he had made several paragraphs on purpose, importing his utter detestation of it, and bestowing his everlasting curse to his sons, whenever they should wear it. For all this, in a few days they appeared higher in the fashion than anybody else in the town. But they solved the matter by saying, that these figures were not at all the same with those that were formerly worn and were meant in the will. Besides, they did not wear them in the sense as forbidden by their father; but as they were a commendable custom, and of great use to the public. That these rigorous clauses in the will did therefore require some allowance and a favorable interpretation, and ought to be understood "with a grain of salt."—Swift.

MANKIND has never wholly recovered from that reign of insanity. Indifference to many of the plainest health-laws of nature is still the reproach of our so-called civilization. Our moralists rant about the golden streets of the New Jerusalem, but find no time to expurgate the slums of their own cities; our missionary societies spend millions to acquaint the natives of distant islands with the ceremony of baptism, but refuse to contribute a penny to the establishment of free public baths.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald's Bible of Nature.

No one tries to cure the ague with prayer. Quinine has been found altogether more reliable. Just as soon as a specific is found for a disease, that disease will be left out of the list of prayer. The number of diseases with which God from time to time afflicts mankind is continually decreasing. In a few years all of them will be under the control of man, the gods will be left unarmed, and the threats of their priests will excite only a smile.—Ingersoll.

THE truth is, I've grown lately rather phthisical:
I don't know what the reason is—the air
Perhaps; but as I suffer from the shocks
Of illness, I grow much more orthodox.

The first attack at once proved the divinity
(But that I never doubted, nor the devil);
The next, the Virgin's mystical virginity;
The third, the usual origin of evil;
The fourth at once established the whole trinity
On so uncontrovertible a level,
That I devoutly wished the three were four,
On purpose to believe so much the more.
—Byron.

LOOK with him into science [the science of that day], religion, state, and with him reduce science, religion, state, to the low standing of every-day events; with him you will see here a bedlam of shriveled up dreamers, narrow and chimerical brains, busy in contradicting, heaping up hollow phrases in moldy books, inventing conjectures, and crying them up for the truth: there, a band of enthusiasts, mumbling phrases which they do not understand, adoring figures of rhetoric as mysteries, attaching holiness or impiety to lawn-sleeves or postures, spending in persecutions or genuflexions the surplus of sheepish or ferocious folly with which an evil fate has crammed their brains; there, again, flocks of idiots pouring out their blood and treasure for the whims or plots of a carriage-drawn aristocrat, out of respect for the carriage which they themselvs hav given him.—Taine on Swift.

LOOKING at my race in its present frightful condition, I feel little else than contempt for it. The people are insane. The rich can scorn them; the cunning can fleece them; impostors lead them through all the labyrinths of absurdity; born rulers exercise tyrannical authority over them; and the Tories can rouse them to madness by a war mania! All the while the poor dupes cringe in abject terror before their tyrants, and worship and imitate those who despise and rob them.—J. Symes.

To combat pharisaism; to unmask imposture; to overthrow tyrannies, usurpations, prejudices, falsehoods, superstitions; to demolish the temple in order to rebuild it, that is to say, to replace the false by the true; to attack a ferocious magistracy; to attack a sanguinary priesthood; to take a whip and drive the money-changers from the sanctuary; to reclaim the heritage of the disinherited; to protect the weak, the poor, the suffering, the overwhelmed, to struggle for the persecuted and oppressed—that was the war of Jesus Christ! And who waged that war? It was Voltaire.—Hugo.

THE five writers to whose genius we owe the first attempt at comprehensiv views of history were Bolingbroke, Montesquieu, Voltaire, Hume, and Gibbon. Of these, the second was but a cold believer in Christianity, if, indeed, he believed in it at all; and the other four were avowed and notorious Infidels.—Buckle.

THE Winfield, Kan., American Nonconformist thinks this clinches the argument: "According to the Declaration of Independence and to the men who signed that great charter of human liberty, all rightful powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed. THE Galveston News's New York correspondent writes to his paper: "Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton is occasionally seen on New York streets again. Her strong-featured face, with its intelligent eyes and crown of beautiful white curls, never fails to attract attention from passers, who stop and look after her until she is beyond view. She is very generally recognized, her pictures having made her face familiar. If there is anything in the theory of a sound mind in a sound body, Mrs. Stanton's vigorous mental habits may be associated with her sturdy health. Even now, with her years upon her and something of a burden of flesh, she has a sound constitution that puts nervously prostrated women to shame, and in her younger days she used to be proud of bearing her children like barbaric mothers, almost without a pang."

Two thousand emigrants left Liverpool for Canada in one week this year, and the next week six additional steamers, with a capacity of 4,500, had to be put on, and they were all filled, and many passengers had to remain over for another week for lack of room. The rate of emigration has been maintained at almost the same point ever since, it is said, and the record of the season will be unprecedented.

TWENTY years ago women could not vote anywhere. To-day they hav full suffrage in Washington and Wyoming territories; municipal suffrage in Kansas; municipal suffrage (single women and widows) in England, Scotland, Ontario, and Nova Scotia; and school suffrage in these fourteen of the United States: New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Kansas, Colorado, Nebraska, Minnesota, Kentucky, Indiana, Michigan, Oregon, and Wisconsin.—Albany Journal.

THE question has often been asked as to what constitutes the greatest pleasure, and who is the happiest man, but it is obviously one that does not admit of solution. The intensity of the pleasurable sensation is a matter of temperament and surroundings, but, cæteris paribus, the happiest man is he who possesses the greatest sensibility, the most powerful imagination, the strongest will, and the least number of prejudices. The men are rare who can by an effort of the will arrest the oscillations of sorrow and allow only chords of pleasure to vibrate. The ideal of perfection in humanity would be to efface pain from the list of sensations, and to giv all men the maximum number of pleasures. All the rest, as the philosopher said, is but dream and vapor.—Medical Press.

THE Atheneum for June 23d prints some hitherto unpublished marginalia by Coleridge on Jahn's "History of the Hebrew Commonwealth." On page 98 he remarks: "God forgiv me if it be an evil thought! But had I read the same account in any profane history, I should not hav scrupled to consider the deposition of Saul as the result of the theocratic party's jealousy of their own diminishing influence. How much less heavy do these transgressions of Saul's seem than those related of David!"

PRINCE AMADEO, of Italy, has received a dispensation from the Vatican to marry Princess Lolilua Bonaparte, daughter of his sister and Prince Jerome. The pope, apologizes a leading Catholic journal, was unwilling, but "as there was a precedent for it, and as Princess Clotilde as well as Prince Amadeo hav deserved well of the church, he yielded and gave his dispensation." That is, Prince Amadeo will marry his niece. To marry one's niece is incest by the laws of man. But the pope, by giving his permission, can make incest no incest. He has the power of making sin virtue and of calling evil good. "There was a precedent for it." Certainly; not only the precedent of Abram, who married his half-sister Sarai—a relationship which is, in blood, exactly equivalent to that of uncle and niece—but the precedent of those other popes who allowed the queen of Spain to marry her uncle, and their son, the prince of Brazil, to marry his aunt.

Was Jesus Insane?

We do not admit that any such person lived as is described in the so-called gospels of the New Testament; or that any such language was employed, or that any such deeds were performed, as are there attributed to the person called Jesus. But as long as others accept the story of this man as true and reliable, and teach that to so accept it is a virtue, we have the right to examine this story, and see whether it be reasonable and worthy of credence. It is generally asserted or assumed that all that Jesus said and did reveals wisdom, charity, and kind-heartedness; but we contend that, if the gospels are trustworthy, much that he said and did reveals ignorance, foolishness, and hard heartedness. It is the common belief that every word which Jesus spoke came from a heart of love; that his every expression was good and true and noble; but, if the gospels are reliable, this belief must be given up. I am aware that in making this statement I antagonize the orthodox estimate of Jesus, but I do not find that the orthodox idea of Jesus is based upon any fair or intelligent understanding of the gospel record. The notion that Jesus was a perfect being, a saint, a god, is not borne out by his language or his deeds. It is this notion which has assumed that everything he said or did was above criticism; for a saint, a god, would not say or do what was not true and right.

Let us for one moment consider the reliability of the gospels. We cannot admit that these accounts of Jesus are to be depended upon.

Assuming that Jesus lived about the time of Tiberius, and that he died when about thirty years of age, there intervenes between the time of his death and the time when the earliest gospel is said to have been written a period of over thirty years A generation had passed away since the scenes were enacted which were to be portrayed. But it is by no means certain that any account of Jesus was written for one hundred years after the time of his death, and if an account was written it is impossible at the present time to know what it was. The utmost that the Christian world dare claim for the gospels of the New T. stament is, that they are founded upon a lost account of Jesus which must have been prepared by some one of his disciples. Waiving all historical objections to the authenticity of the gospel narrative, let us consider the story in the light of common sense.

To assert that the gospel account of what Jesus said is reliable, is to declare that we have the exact words which he spoke and a faithful description of what he did. To have such words and such a description, it would be necessary to have a phonographic report of his speeches when delivered and an accurate account of his acts by an eye-witness. Anything less than this would be less than the truth. Will anyone presume to say that the gospel story was written by an eye-witness, and that the Sermon on the Mount, the parables, and the exclamations of Jesus were phonographically reported? I think not.

All that we have, then, is what was repeated about this man thirty years after his death. Common report, hearsay, gossip, imagination, furnished the writers of the gospels with their materials.

There is one way that we may test the reliability of what is put in the mouth of Jesus. This man delivered a discourse, according to the author of Matthew's gospel, containing 2,473 words, known as the Sermon on the Mount. It was delivered to his disciples. How many there were we have no way of determining. But among those who heard Jesus do you think there was one who would be able to repeat every one of the 2,473 words of his sermon thirty years afterwards exactly as it was delivered? Is it probable that such a thing could be done? If not, have we the words that Jesus spoke upon that occasion?

There are thousands of people in Boston who listened to the Rev. Samuel Jones less than one year ago. Among this vast number are many of the brightest Christian people; but do you believe that a single man or woman who heard this noted preacher at that time could repeat what he said word for word? Do you believe that thirty years hence there could be found one person of that multitude who could quote one single sentence just as it was delivered by the Rev. Samuel Jones? How, then, are we to believe that in the New Testament are recorded the exact words which Jesus uttered, when no one claims that they were written until he had been dead at least thirty years?

The entire New Testament is the work of Catholic churchmen. It did not assume its present shape until three hundred years, at least, after Jesus died. That it was principally composed as long ago as that is generally admitted, although many alterations and interpolations have been made since that date.

The gospels are not only contradictory of one another, but not one of them presents throughout a consistent character of Jesus. Several minds have written their conceptions over the original ideal. It is evident that the different Christian schismatics have taken the liberty to add to the text of the gospels.

It is not our purpose to point out the inconsistencies in the character of Jesus as the gospels present him, but rather to hold up the picture of this person in the light of those extravagant expressions which have been accepted as proof of his divinity, but which seem rather to indicate his insanity. It is declared by Christian believers that the gospels can not be explained upon the ground that Jesus was a man. We would ask, Why? What is there about this story that indicates that it deals with a divine subject? I can see nothing that does not show a human being. What are the signs of divinity? There is no record that goes to prove that Jesus, in outward form, differed from human nature. In fact, there is not a line, a word, that has any reference whatever to his physical appearance. He might have been black or white, a giant or a dwarf, as far as the gospel writers give us any information in regard to his form or looks. In the tomb of silence was laid the body of Jesus, and only the angel of imagination can roll away the stone that shut from mortal sight the image of the man. There is only one way by which to judge of the character of this person, and that is by his speech and behavior. What must a God say and do to establish his divine presence? Let us see what Jesus said and did, and find, if we can, whether a God once lived upon this earth, or whether a man, under a mental delusion, tried to play the part of a deity.

How do we prove a person insane? Is it not by his words and acts, by what he says and what he does? If a person uses foolish and extravagant language, if he performs deeds for which can be offered no good or rational excuse, he is adjudged insane. Did any person ever make use of more irrational speech; ever put forth claims to more preposterous power; ever utter more intemperate, insane language, than the person called Jesus? It has been advanced that while the utterances of Jesus are extravagant and unintelligible as the language of a human being, they become perfectly clear in the light that he was a divine being.

I want this point understood, because it is all-important in the discussion of the question of the character of Jesus—that his divinity has been assumed from his language. It is absolutely necessary to find in the language of Jesus the proof of his divinity before there can be accepted the notion that a God once dwelt upon the earth with men.

There is nothing outside of the gospels of the New Testament that can be adduced in support of the idea that Jesus was divine. It will be acknowledged by the Christian world that any such speech as Jesus used in the mouth of any other person would be evidence of insanity. Then why is not such speech evidence of his insanity? We propose to demonstrate that the words of Jesus are the words of a man mentally deranged.

There seems to be a fear of the name of Jesus, a moral cowardice that possesses the world when this name is spoken. It is time for men to get over this fear; time to look at this person the same as we look at Socrates, Seneca, or any of the ancients. The name of Jesus is the name of a man, and it was a name that was quite common in the time of Josephus. It is a name that we need speak with no particular reverence.

The Christian exaltation of Jesus is without reason. There are no facts to warrant it. I claim that much of the language of Jesus is not sensible, not rational; certainly not the language of a sane mind. Had he declared that he was the wisest, noblest, best man that had ever lived on earth, mankind would unhesitatingly pronounce him an egotist, and the most conceited person that ever existed; what shall we say, then, of a person who called himself the Son of God, and said that God was his father, and that he and his father were one? Is this conceit, egotism, or madness? It is upon such claims as these that the divine character of Jesus has been asserted.

Let us think for a moment what the effect would be upon the mind of the world if a person to-day should employ the language which Jesus used! Suppose a man whom we have known more or less intimately for years, about whom there was nothing particularly remarkable, should go about the streets and engage people in conversation, and should say to them, "I and my Father are one," and "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," meaning, I and God are the same, and he that hath seen me hath seen God, what would we say of such a man? We would say that he was crazy, and every medical expert in the United States would sign a certificate of his insanity.

Now, upon what ground can we declare a man insane who makes such an audacious claim to-day, and believe that a man who made a similar claim two thousand years ago was of sound mind? Was it easier to be a God then than now? Was the world's idea of divinity different in the first century from what it is in the latest century?

It may be objected here that Jesus did not mean what his words imply; that he did not directly claim that he was God. If he did not, then his language is only metaphysical nonsense, and does not deserve serious consideration; or else it was intended to deceive, and shows that Jesus was an impostor.

Jesus was an ordinary individual so far as his earthly surroundings were concerned. He was not one of the rich or great ones of earth, but one of the common people. It was objected to his claim to be divine that he had the habits of the lower classes. By trade he was probably a carpenter. Now, think of such a person as this throwing down his hammer and saw and taking up the scepter of the universe—sometimes claiming to be the Son of God and again to be God himself! Had Cæsar done this, the whole pagan world would have pronounced him insane.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to account for the very extraordinary career of Jesus upon the ground of sanity. There is only one way to explain the gospels—either Jesus was insane or the person who wrote his life was.

It is generally admitted that people who are not mentally sane are easily moved to anger and that any opposition or contradiction produces an excited condition which manifests itself in violent speech or action. Jesus is represented in all of the gospels, except the gospel of John, as denouncing people with little apparent cause. Such a course cannot be reconciled with his teachings. He commands his disciples to love their enemies, and says: "Bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you."

In direct opposition to such teaching we find him exclaiming: "Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven."

"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law."

"And a man's foes shall be they of his own household." "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me." A more fiendish mission could not have been undertaken. To change the peace and love of homes into discord and strife, to arm the hand of a son against the heart of a father, to plant the seeds of hate in the soil of affection, is the scheme of a madman! When a city or town would not receive Jesus, he denounced it, and pronounced woes upon it. Here is one instance of his upbraiding. He exclaims: "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell; for if the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. But I say unto you, that it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for thee." Jesus was especially angry with the Pharisees, who treated him and his pretensions with the utmost scorn, and he heaped upon them all the abuse that he could put into language. Almost the whole of the twenty-third chapter of Matthew is filled with violent ravings against the Pharisees. It would be easy to cite many passages which show that Jesus could not brook opposition, and that he was moved to anger upon the slightest pretext, but it is not necessary to our purpose.

What is needed in this age is to see Jesus as a man; to estimate his speech as we estimate the speech of man, and to judge him as we would judge any other person.

Would men and women but read the gospels as they read their papers, and without that blind faith that sees them holy and perfect in every word, they would reject the foolish notion that the mad speeches of Jesus are evidences of his divinity.

We read in the third chapter of the gospel according to Mark a very singular account. It relates that Jesus chose twelve men from among his disciples and ordained them "that he might send them forth to preach," and that "when his friends heard of it they went out to lay hold on him, for they said, He is beside himself."

This is the verdict of every sensible person who reads the gospels to-day, and had this verdict of the friends of Jesus been respected, the world would not have been shrouded in the terrible darkness of Christian superstitions for over a thousand years, nor would the mind of this age be deformed by believing the monstrous fiction that a being that once walked this earth was God.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

From Ingersoll's "Talmagian Catechism."

Question. Why did Christ allow himself to be betrayed if he knew the plot?

Answer. Infidelity is a very good doctrin to liv by, but you should read the last words of Paine and Voltaire.

Q. If Christ knew that Judas would betray him, why did he choose him?

A. Nothing can exceed the atrocities of the French Revolution—when they carried a woman through the streets and worshiped her as the goddess of Reason.

Q. Would not the mission of Christ hav been a failure had no one betrayed him?

A. Thomas Paine was a drunkard, and recanted on his death-bed, and died a blaspheming Infidel besides.

Eve.

Poor old Mother Eve! Sh! never say "old" of the sex—never! for where can you find them that are old? Poor Eve—poor Mrs. Adam—how little consideration she gets at the hands of Jahveh, in "his book!" How cavalier, so to put it, the treatment of the original woman, the one lone feminin of the genus homo! Why, her name—well, how many times is it mentioned in the H Q? Fifty, eh? Will you take off fifteen? You will? Well, suppose you drop twenty more—yes, twenty; that's what I said. Dropped, hav you? Well, now I don't wish you to giv up everything, but please take off thirteen more, and I'll ask for no further reduction. Yes, I mean it—mean that the name Eve is mentioned only twice in the Holy Queer! That's a fine way to treat the "first lady of the land," now, isn't it? Why, the belle of a chowder party, in a "stickful" notice of the affair, would get in for more frequent mention than that! Twice, and no more, from start to finish, does the name of Eve appear on the pages of the Holy Queer!

And how much is there relating to her, anyhow? That is not the way to express it. Ask how little, and look to find very little indeed. One cannot help exclaiming, after reading all that is chronicled of Lady Eve, "If so soon she was done for, what was she begun for?" In the second, third, and fourth chapters of Genesis, said chapters comprising seventy-five verses, you will find twenty of the latter that relate to Eve, and for the most part, indirectly at that! As I once before observed, or to the same effect, What sort of way was that to treat the "first lady of the land?" Twenty verses, of indirect mention, for the most part—twenty lines, all told! Why, she should hav had a "book" of at least twenty chapters, referring directly to her, and every fair-minded man and woman will agree with me! Poor Eve! it was a shame to make so little of the "mother of all living," as Adam put it—a burning shame!

Did Jahveh damn Eve with faint mention because he considered her a sort of second fiddle, as it were, or because she ate the pippin? The latter, probably. for when it comes to the matter of propagation of species, and fiddles are considered, the "second" is quite as all-important a factor as the "first," every time, and Jahveh must hav known it; so it wasn't for that reason that he was so chary of his mention, but because of the pippin episode.

Poor, unsophisticated Eve! I never reproached thee for taking a bite of that pippin—never! And a magnanimous God, it seems to me, ought to hav overlooked it; for what, in your sweet innocence, did you know of the mottled, green guile that lay perdu in the cockles of that "pesky sarpint's" heart—or gizzard? I don't know as the O'Phidians hav hearts. Nothing at all, of course. You never consorted with the O'Phidian gang, any more than with the O'Rang or MacKerel gang. They were no company for you, dear; what I mean is, you never went picnicking, huckleberrying, buggy-riding, moonlight-aloning, or even ice-creaming with snakes—now, did you, Eve? So what could you know of the fatal taffy of the "pesky sarpint?" Again I say, nothing at all. And for a first slip up, under the circumstances, Jahveh was mighty rough on you, in my opinion.

Ten thousand things could hav been said of thee, sweet Eve, that would hav carried more delight to the average female heart—male as well—than would the substance of as many cold ice-creams, each flanked with cake and paid for by reluctant beaux. What had we not known of thee, sweet Eve, had a reporter of this our day and generation been there or thereabouts to see and interview thee, dear? Think of it, sweet maid, and wife as soon as made, and that ye reporter was not there weep scalding tears of molten anguish—"molten anguish" is good, I flatter myself, not as a steady diet, of course, but, with said tears, as a sort of sublimated sandwich of subdued sorrow, as it were.

Ah, "maid of the mist," the mist of the past, I mean—what hav you and I and all of us missed, because of ye missed reporter? Heaps, lots—city lots barred—slathers, and oceans of—what? Why, information concerning thee. Of course you knew it all; but don't tell me that you wouldn't liked to hav known that an admiring world would gloat over a graphic description of yourself and surroundings, in the far-away ages after you slept with your mothers—oh, but you didn't hav any mothers, did you? Well, daughters, then.

O for that reporter, and we had known whether thou wast of the blond or brunet type! Whether thy "wealth of hair," thy "crowning glory," wert sunshine materialized or raven blackness spun to finest silk—if red, we should hav known if the white horse bobbed up serenely. We should hav known if thy ears were small, translucent, and displaying the delicate pink of the sea-shell, or if opake, uncouth floppers. If thine eyes were cerulean, erebusean, or betwixt and between, including the "cold, gray eye" of speculativ love. Whether retrousse or Grecian was thy organ of smell—but hold; the nose question is settled, I guess. Hadst thou dimples in cheeks and chin we should hav known of them. A sweet little mouth, like Cupid's bow in shape, with red, ripe, pouting lips, honey-dripping, and pearly teeth within, we had known it; also if a mouth to make a mince pie quail—I don't mean quail pie, as you might think, possibly—at its approach.

Were thy shoulders sloping, or square like the Amazon's, we had known it. Tall thy form and sylph-like, or short and pudgy, and thou wouldst hav been portrayed to us. Angular or rounded, with sharp lines or soft curves, and ye reporter would not hav failed us, you bet! Hadst thou a No. 2 foot, but which the average Chicago girl's shoe would more comfortably fit, ye reporter might hav lied a size or two to your favor, possibly—the same if No. 8 gloves were required. Hadst thine arms been fair and round, and sizable and shapely, with small dimpled hands, terminating with taper fingers, and nails too lovely for anything, doubt not that ye reporter would hav chronicled the same. Hadst thou a queenly walk—this is understood to be a gait of graceful hauteur, so to speak, but there are queens, no doubt, who couldn't get away with a burnt cruller in a cake walk—and carriage—by this I mean mien, you know, and not a wheeled vehicle—or otherwise, so would ye reporter hav writ. Had thy smile shamed the sun in its warmth and brightness, thy "silvery voice" the multitudinous birds with envy filled, making the many-hued one green, or, on the contrary, the one and the other respectivly, hav frozen the blood of Adam and made melodious the squealing of a pig by comparison, the world would hav known of it.

O gentle Eve of Eden, had Jahveh understood human nature—not to be expected, as it hadn't showed out—you had been immortalized as you are not—that is, if he had done the right square thing by you; and all the world of women would to-day pore over the record concerning you, your ways and your surroundings! See how, when a new gown of Mrs. Cleveland's is faithfully described by faithful scribes, the lesser women of the land just gloat upon and gabble in the gladsome tidings, grateful to their souls! And, gentle Eve, the men would read of you with more or less delight, make no mistake. Why, faithfully described, thyself and daily doings, together with the fashion of that coat of skins, which Jahveh made for thee, the trimming not omitted, thou wouldst hav captured for the Holy Queer more readers in a week than would the story, "magnified" a thousand times, of Moses and the Hebrews' wild-goose chase for that they never caught in forty months of Sundays!

O beauteous Eve, I weep great tears, and tiers on tiers of tears, to think how thou wert bilked of merited renown! 'Tis plain, and more than plain. that Jehovah made a wild and wide mistake in treating thee so cavalierly, slightingly; but then the slight on thee has been a blight upon the Holy Queer, in lessening its readers, which must be some satisfaction unto thee, sweet Eve!

It is never too late to mend, they say, O Early Eve of Eden, and Jahveh may again, some time, "revise" his work, and giv thee fair thy due; and hoping for that time, sweet Eve, I say, adieu!

More Protection Wanted.

Although duties hav been placed upon food, clothing, and fuel when imported from other countries, the greatest competitor with the home industries that produce these articles is permitted free importation into the United States. Complete protection will not be secured to these nativ industries until a duty is imposed upon sunshine. The heat and light of the sun, freely entering our large cities, greatly diminishes the consumption of fuel, gas, coal oil, food, and clothing. In order to make our country truly prosperous, and to carry out consistently the policy of protection to home industries, the following plan is proposed. Our large cities should be roofed over to exclude the rays of the sun, only leaving openings at the houses of those who pay a heavy sun tax. The building of these roofs would greatly stimulate our iron-mines, foundries, rolling-mills, saw mills, and would employ a large number of carpenters, builders, and laborers, while the exclusion of natural heat and light would cause a large increase in the consumption of the articles that supply these needs artificially. A great stimulus would be given to coal-mines, oil-wells, gas-works, woolen-mills, and the production of heat-producing foods, as by sugar refineries and cattle-raising. Indirectly multitudes of trades would be made activ, and the country would contain an industrious and prosperous people.

The present tariff it is claimed does not benefit professional men, but the exclusion of sunshine would doubtless promote disease and death, therefore doctors and druggists would be more largely employed, ministers would hav more funerals to attend, and lawyers would make more wills and settle more estates, besides having an increase of litigation about trespasses while the roof was building. As mortality would be greatest amongst the poorer classes, this would prove a protection to labor, and the lessening of competition for employment would advance wages. It is hard to foresee all the advantages that would ensue from this policy, but enough has been said to show that the exclusion of sunshine, or a heavy tax upon those unpatriotic people who insist upon using the heat and light imported from the foreign kingdom of heaven, would prove of immense advantage to the country, besides showing that it is determined to adhere consistently to the principles of the protectiv policy.

ROBERT C. ADAMS.

Seizing a Spirit Hand.

Many people think that the spirit hands which appear at the light circles might be grasped and held fast. At a recent special séance held at the house of a friend there was present a skeptical German. The time came for getting messages written by a visible hand before the curtain. After two or three had been written the nand beckoned to the German to come up. He went and seized it with both his own, intending to draw it forth and hold it fast. Instead of that, he himself was violently jerked forward, and it seemed as if he would plunge right through the curtain, carrying all before him. But in an instant he withdrew, and returned to his seat saying, "It ish Keeler's hand." The company all laughed, and Mr. Keeler said to the man, "Why didn't you hold on to it? It would hav been the first time that anybody was able to hold it."

The hand came out between the heads of the two men sitting with Mr. Keeler, and to prove that it was not Mr. Keeler's, when the three sitters were uncovered and fully exposed to view, he was requested to reach as far as he could with his right arm; he did so, and his hand fell short of the place where the spirit hand came out by a foot.

Furthermore, if it had been Mr. Keeler's hand extended behind the sitter next to him, and coming out between the shoulders of the two sitters, how was it possible for him, with his arm in that position, to jerk a strong man forward? The least effort on the part of the strong man would hav pulled the middle sitter forward in his chair, and only a little force would hav tumbled him out. But on the contrary he was undisturbed and unmoved when the German appeared to be plunging through the curtain and almost upset. All this I saw, and my husband was one of the sitters.

"Letters from Friends."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Why do you print scurrilous letters like that of Charles Laperche? Is it good policy to allow one correspondent to call another a liar, a hypocrit, and a fool? If you, Mr. Editor, hav the slightest doubt of my honesty or sincerity, I beg nevermore to hav a line in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

My description of "Two Light-Circle Séances" was prefaced thus:

> I might say in advance, as the magician Harry Keller said, after witnessing certain manifestations in Calcutta in 1882: "I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence," etc.

Quoting only what the magician says, Mr. Laperche makes this comment:

> After such a preliminary, expect no truth. Such an apology is a decided guarantee that a pack of lies is about to be palmed off for truth.

When personalities of this sort are thus allowed to be printed, ought not the Editor to offset them by a word in defense of the misrepresented and maligned correspondent? In most cases this would prevent an angry and unprofitable personal controversy.

W. H. BURR.

Antinaturali-m Driven Back a Little.

A mass meeting was recently held at Harmonia Hall, Minneapolis, Minn., to discuss 'Sunday Amusements." Mr. Gallagher complained of the church elders who "want to make this country like ancient England when people had to go to bed at a certain hour at the ringing of a bell." Judge Rand "liked to see a game of ball on Sunday, and thought he would go down some afternoon." W. E Stirling, of the People's Theater, then got a tremendous round of applause by saying that a clergyman had got up a petition against playing ball on Sundays with only forty signers, while the baseball managers had one to the contrary with thousands of names attached, and still the forty wanted to rule the thousands. Rev. M. A. Marcy said he would answer by saying that if the forty were right and the thousands were wrong, the forty should rule. The burden of his speech lay in discussing the Bible. He was interrupted by the hisses of the audience, which demonstrated which way the sentiment was. He was followed by a gentleman named Nostrum, who said he thought the ministers ought to mind their own business. After the Rev. Walter Messaros, of Philadelphia, had raved for a while, Thomas H Lucas, the labor agitator, said he thought the reverend from Philadelphia was one of the most bigoted men he had ever seen, and that he had no right to dictate to the people how they should amuse themselvs on Sunday. The Rev. Mr. Torrey then raved some more. After the following resolutions had been adopted by a unanimous vote, the meeting adjourned:

> WHEREAS, an effort is being made through the instrumentality of the extraordinary proceeding of an injunct on to preve t the public of this city, and especially the industrial population, from enjoying the harmless and healthful recreation of witnessing the game of baseball on Sunday afternoons, and whereas, every consideration of moral and physical welfare dictates that the working people of this city, who are closely confined for six days in the week, should be permitted to enjoy outdoor recreation on Sunday afternoon, therefore,
> Resolved, That we deem it to be for the best interest of this city that the innocent amusements of the people be not interfered with.

Another Catholic Outrage.

Mrs. Annie Thomas, wife of Edward Thomas, residing within a few blocks of the writer, at the suggestion of friends called on Commissioner Williams Friday to secure his service and sympathy toward procuring the release of her eleven-year-old daughter, who is forcibly detained in the House of the Good Shepherd "without due process of law." This is the same delectable institution with whose frauds the secretary has made the Liberal public pretty familiar, and which had to secure a truckling judge to save it from the moral effects of the trickery. However, the end is not yet, and the supreme court has the power to suppress this fraud—if it only possesses the courage.

This family are very poor, and their financial condition was by no means enhanced by an accident which laid up the girl's father for several weeks.

Mrs. Parks, Ellen's grandmother, informed me that several weeks ago a lady with whom Mrs. Thomas was but slightly acquainted asked permission to take the girl to the theater, but the request was refused. A few days after the child disappeared, but no alarm was felt, as she was in the habit of spending a large portion of her time with her grandmother, to whom she was devotedly attached. It was soon discovered, however, that she was not there. The anxiety of the family can better be imagined than described, but despite their poverty and affliction, the poor old lady of some eighty years and her daughter-in-law searched the city over in vain for a trace of the fair Ellen—who is counted an unusually lovely girl.

Weeks passed, but no tidings, although they never gave up the search. Some days ago Mrs. Thomas was informed that a girl answering the description of Ellen had been sentenced to the House of the Good Shepherd by Justice Lyon. An investigation confirmed the rumor. The Thomases then appealed to this justice (?) to remit the fine and restore the girl, as they would take proper care of her, and, moreover, they did not wish her in a Catholic institution. At this declaration, this embodiment of justice and gentility snapped like a cur that he would not release her, and refused either to giv a reason or pay further attention to the old lady's pleadings. The reason is, I am informed, that he is a Roman Catholic. That is reason enough.

The House of the Good Shepherd was visited, but not until Friday last did the mother and grandmother obtain an interview with the daughter, and then only after a three hours' delay. Before the interview the sisters labored with the parents to hav them let the girl alone, because she was so well cared for—much better than they could expect to provide, and said that she would make "a nice sister, and a pretty one, too." The mother was obdurate—she wanted her own child, but they refused to restore her till the court demanded it. Between the bars, and, for the purpose of intimidation, under the surveillance of the sisters, this interview took place. The girl told this peculiar and almost incredible story: She had been taken away by a strange woman to nurse a sick baby, and at 11 o'clock at night the woman, for some reason, turned her in the street. A policeman picked her up crying and took her to the station. Next morning she was arraigned before Justice Lyon and sentenced to that institution, but for what reason the youthful victim could not comprehend. Despite the excellent care the sisters said she was having, the girl presented a pitiable appearance. Her hair, which was ordinarily light, was nearly black from either dye or dirt. When the poor thing called her mother's attention to her shoes, which were so badly torn that her feet were on the pavement, the amiable sister suddenly closed the interview with, "Go back; you hav talked with your mother long enough."

Saturday morning Commissioner Williams called Mrs. Thomas before the county board, nd his associates showed an aversion to touching a case which might possibly bring them in conflict with the Catholic church, at first refusing to listen to the case. But the determined commissioner insisted, and they unanimously agreed that the justice had no more authority to commit that girl than had the writer, that power being vested only in a county judge. This case only shows the anxiety with which the good (?) sisters snatch the waifs to compel the county treasurer to pay them $10 per month, besides pocketing the proceeds of their labor and spreading the power of the church. I would not be surprised if Mr. Thomas was arrested on a trumped-up charge, so the girl might be held permanently and the Mullen case repeated in Chicago. Later, the Herald says it is all "stuff" about the girl's alleged detention. The Herald is owned by Mike Walsh, and is the archbishop's organ. I hav hunted up the facts, and they are just as above written. If that child is not released there will be an indignation meeting called on the west side, and the Secular Union will take a hand in it.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

The seventh annual convention of the Society of Christian Endeavor has just closed its session in Battery D, when over four thousand delegates and an equal number of visitors were in attendance.

Just think of this young stripling of an organization—this mere side-show of the Christian host—drawing together such numbers of young people from all parts of this vast continent.

While listening to the secretary's annual report, in my endeavor to find out what they were endeavoring to do, I was forcibly struck with their activity, although the secretary spoke of the meager sum (about $19,500) placed at his command. Meager sum, eh! Well, comparisons are odious. While we deplore the pernicious doctrin of drawing dollars from this country with which to convert the heathen, and thereby running the risk of losing their precious souls which are safe in ignorance, we cannot but admire their practical business method and the splendid liberality with which these endeavorers sustain their cause.

Yet Liberals who espouse the grander code of humanity, a more elevating morality, a sounder philosophy, and who must first propose all progressiv movements, and generally head them until they become popular, are so steeped in sodden indifference that all our efforts can arouse only a tithe of our number to activity. This has been the case for many years. The great mass of Liberals do nothing—count for nothing. One would think that such high ideals, such noble aspirations for the future of the race, would of themselvs inspire heroic eagerness and enthusiasm to proclaim and practicalize them, especially when the foundations of our liberty and government are threatened by tireless and restless enemies; that our present anxiety would be to rescue and retain the principle upon which this republic was founded—mental liberty. Then why do not Liberals dash to the front as one man, thrilled with the justice of their cause and the grandeur of their purpose?

Having paid some attention to this listless apathy of Liberals, I am inclined to attribute it to the perversion of what passes for the acme of liberty—individualism. The greater portion of our literature and lectures are permeated with extreme, indiscriminate individualism. As our people's opinions are influenced by their environments (which means their mental pabulum), they necessarily partake and largely adopt a philosophy which has a decidedly disintegrating tendency, always crippling organization or well-nigh making it impossible, utterly destructiv of the desire for unity or concert of action, and productiv of inertia and indifference. This is the natural effect of so palpable a cause.

Such Liberals will boast that they are "outside the church, and that's enough;" they do not believe "in heaven or hell, or God or the devil, so that settles it for them;" they hav "no use for rituals or creeds, or dogmas or organization." Is it any wonder that with this perversion of what constitutes true liberty there should be a decadence of organization and a general indifference? Secularism, or Liberalism, should, in my judgment, teach that liberty never was nor never can be limited to an individual affair. There is no liberty to me while another can be oppressed, for my liberty may be curtailed next. Liberty—mental liberty—is a question which is not for the individual so much as the race. As separate identities there is no such thing as liberty or oppression; it is only as we come into relation with each other that those terms acquire their significance.

Daniel Defoe, on the island of San Juan Fernandez, may be said to enjoy "liberty." What a mockery of his solitude!—for he would rather

> Dwell in the midst of alarms
> Than reign in this horrible place.

One obstacle, one bane of Freethought, which keeps it from being a powerful and positiv factor, is this isolating, unrelated laissez-faire, called individualism, or I might say its misapplication. A conception of liberty which paralyzes action is sure to be a promoter of despotism, and is opposed to nature's law of survival and solidarity. It leaves us planless and powerless; leaves the honest at the mercy of the crafty; leaves all who gain by the power of the church to crush out our liberty in the state.

If this dangerous and distorted application of liberty were thoroughly dissipated, our Freethought societies and conventions might be very different affairs, and rival in attendance and importance many of the Christian conventions. Friends, let us hav a grand rally at Pittsburgh!

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

SNOHOMISH, WASH. TERR., June 9th to 14th.—This is a thriving little place, pleasantly located on the Snohomish river, reached by daily steamboat from Seattle. There is a large Liberal element here, led by that consistent Liberal, prince of good fellows, and friend and worker for THE TRUTH SEEKER, J. S. Martin. I delivered six lectures here to very intelligent and appreciativ audiences.

The following extract is from a column-and-a-half report of the lectures in the Eye, the leading newspaper of the county:

> The audiences that greeted C. B. Reynolds, the Liberal lecturer, in Odd Fellows' Hall this week, were, with one exception, the largest that ever listened to a lecture in the building. The exception was on the occasion of the visit of G. R. Colby, Spiritual lecturer and test medium, about two years ago. Mr. Reynolds is a forcible and eloquent speaker, and his lectures are made doubly interesting by an admirable blending of logic, sarcasm, and humor. He arrays common sense against myth and superstition, fact against theory, love against hate, truth against error, justice against injustice. After each lecture he invited questions and criticism. But one gentleman accepted the invitation, and in the words of the poet, "He didn't know it was loaded." Fifteen years' service as an evangelist has made Mr. Reynolds familiar with the "good book," from which he frequently read passages (giving book, chapter, and verse, that the audience might satisfy themselvs he did not misquote), proving its faulty inspiration, and that even Gods are often more devilish than devils. In his fourth lecture he alluded to the danger threatening our public school system by the Catholic-Protestant combination which is attempting to place the cross above the flag.

The Catholic priest paid a visit to Snohomish the day I left there; he was after funds. The most financially responsible members of his church had attended the lectures, and the very one he most depended on both to giv and to help extort shekels from the other members declared he would never giv another dollar to the church—he would save his money to pay Liberal lecturers like Mr. Reynolds, who gave the people facts and common sense, not superstitious humbuggery. The priest was alarmed and very angry. He declared he could refute everything the Infidel had said—could overthrow him in just five minutes. Oh, he wished he could meet the Infidel lecturer before the people! etc. The Catholic friend at once sought Mr. Martin, who promptly answered him the priest's desire could be gratified; that he would answer for me. That I would meet the priest that night at Odd Fellows' Hall, or at any other time or place if he would promptly fix the date.

Mr. Martin reported to me, and I remained awaiting the response of the priest to the last moment, only stepping on board the steamboat as it started, leaving assurance that I would return on any date the priest would elect to meet me in public debate.

Priests and parsons are alike heroic in the absence of the Liberal lecturer. They fill the Bible description: "Like dumb dogs they open not their mouths," each seeking his gain in his quarters, fearing to bark in the presence of the exponent of Liberalism. They know the facts and arguments are like the handle on a jug, and that we hav the handle.

LA CONNER, WASH. TERR., June 17th, 18th, 19th.—This is a romantic little village, hid away on one of the outlets of the sound. To reach it one has to go through a very narrow, rocky pass, the current so strong that, when the wind is contrary, steamboats are unable to make the pass; and as on the occasion of my going away from La Conner the steamboat tried half the night to get in, but could not, they had to send in a yawl-boat for passengers, and with six passengers, trunk, and grips, I had a rowboat ride of more than three miles from La Conner to the steamboat.

Not alone had there never been a Liberal lecture at La Conner, but the people generally appeared to be oblivious of the teachings of Liberalism. On Sunday afternoon the Sunday-school was dismissed just about the time of the commencement of my lecture, and two-thirds of the scholars marched in; but the most strenuous endeavors were made to keep them away from the subsequent lectures.

George B. and Andrew Morrison, not relativs, but united in zealous effort to advance the cause of Liberalism; young, energetic, popular with all classes, may be relied on to follow up the interest awakened, and keep Liberal literature in activ circulation.

NEWCASTLE, WASH. TERR., June 20th, 21st, 22d.—This is a coal-mining camp, about twenty miles from Seattle. Rough, primitiv, the uncertain tenure of residence prevents the miners from making such improvements and home adornments as they would gladly make if sure of steady work and permanence of abode. Here I met many rough diamonds, manly men, men of brawn and brains, toilers in the dark, dismal mines, yet many of them men of thought and culture. The leading spirit was friend Wm. Penman, a stanch Infidel, the earnest, conscientious, consistent advocate and defender of the rights of labor.

There is a Catholic element of the lowest order, illiterate, brutal, the occasion of much trouble and dissension, but no Protestantism. It is over two years since the last parson left the place in despair; he could get neither hearers nor ducats. And now—oh! that it might be so in every place—the church building is used only as a school house.

I delivered three lectures to deeply interested audiences, but the last lecture was not well attended, on account of the great agitation caused by the orders to shut down the mines—that means loss of work, removal, privation, and destitution to very many families.

I go from here to Olympia to enjoy four days' holiday. My health is much improved.

The Ingersoll Gladstone Controversy.

Prof. R. A. Proctor in the North American Review.

Mr. Gladstone recognizes that "the moral history of man, in its principal stream, has been distinctly an evolution from the first until now." This recognition of evolution in morals should suggest that in regard to doctrin also, the other branch of religion, and therefore in regard to religion as a whole, the history of man has been from the first until now distinctly an evolution. Mr. Gladstone's recognition of evolution in morals is in reality an admission, and entirely inconsistent (could he but see it) with the old belief which he professes still to entertain, that the moral nature of man was a definit gift, good at first but early impaired, not by a process of evolution, but as the result of the definit action of man's first parents.

I know not how the evolution of religion can be considered otherwise than in a profoundly religious spirit. The thoughtful mind must contemplate with feelings of awe man's relations with the ineffable mystery residing behind phenomena. Yet a feeling of "reverential calm" appropriate in the presence of the thoughts of this infinit mystery is not desirable when superstitious ideas about it, only respectable because of their antiquity, are in question. Nay, reverential calm in dealing with teachings about the godhead which (fondly claiming to be based on knowledge) are in reality blasphemous, is essentially irreverent. If, for instance, Colonel Ingersoll is right in his contention that in these days when better and purer moral ideas hav been evolved, the common teachings about Jehovah are an insult alike to God and man, his assaults upon those teachings, whether conducted by sarcasm, by raillery, or by earnest rebuke, are akin to that anger of which it has been said that those who are moved by it "do well to be angry." . . .

But we cannot escape the certain conclusion that whether they were relating historic facts or borrowing myths, the writers of the Pentateuch, Joshua and Judges, addressed a race as yet scarce emerged from savagery, and themselvs accepted the hideous ideas of deity which they promulgated among their people. Though we must not call their teachings foolish or offensiv or wicked for them, yet in themselvs and for us those teachings are as hateful, as wicked, as blasphemous as they hav been called (somewhat too generally) by Colonel Ingersoll. Mr. Gladstone cannot escape this by assuming an air of reverential calm. The Talmages and the Sam Joneses can no more silence the teachings of men's hearts by beating the drum-ecclesiastic than the priests who made hideous noises to dumb the cries of mothers when their first-born were immolated to Moloch could quench those mothers' tears, or by clamor still the beating of those mothers' hearts. It remains the simple fact that those to whom we owe the earliest Bible teachings about the godhead, so far from being inspired to conceive of deity as almighty, all-wise, all-perfect, pictured a being whose plans were constantly foiled, who was no wiser than they were themselvs, and whose ways were the ways of the worst and most brutal of the savage rulers they chiefly feared.

I can for my own part be patient with the poor savages who pictured gods savage and unreasoning as themselvs; but I must confess I sympathize in my heart of hearts with Colonel Ingersoll when he loses all thought of reverential calm in contemplating the ways of men who in these days of a higher and purer morality can speak otherwise than with horror of the being pictured as the God of Abraham, the God of Moses, and the God of Jephthah. Of what use is the evolution of morality if we are to hold by the teachings of the morality of savage times? And in what way shall men who love mercy, who as fathers seek their children's love, speak of a conception of the God which while calling him our father pictures him as mercilessly seeking his children's lives?

Where is the greater irreverence, in saying, "These are God's words and therefore I will take them to heart, though they seem to present God as a terrible, nay horrible being," or in saying, "These words picture God as cruel and unjust, therefore they can not be God's words—it were blasphemy to deem them such?" . . .

It is to this idea of a sacrifice-loving God that the failure of the tender and merciful teachings of Christianity to bring mercy and peace into the world must be chiefly attributed. It was "prophecy after the event" which caused an early Christian writer to put into the mouth of the teacher of peace the hard saying (which moves Colonel Ingersoll to just warmth of indignation), "I came not to bring peace, but a sword into the world." The "Logia" of Matthew (much older than the rest of the gospel) show that the true Christian doctrin taught peace and self-sacrifice, love and mercy. We may be certain that the same lips did not say, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will giv you rest," and "I came not to send peace, but a sword."

The process of evolution in religion is yet once more tending in these days, as in the days of the greater Isaiah, to bring unworthy ideas respecting deity into disfavor among men of just and merciful minds. But we must not expect "reverential calm" in such men. How can they be calm with what moves them to just wrath? How can they be reverential in the presence of what seems to them unworthy of reverence—worthy of the opposit of reverence? Did Isaiah treat the formal religion, the sacrificial system, and the insult to deity underlying it, with reverential calm? Nay, but he pictured the Lord himself as full of anger, because "evil was called good, and good evil," and because justice and mercy and loving-kindness, replaced by ceremonial observances which were "an abomination unto him." "'I will turn my hand upon thee,' saith the Lord. 'and thoroughly purge away thy dross, and will take away all thine alloy.'"

Colonel Ingersoll may hav somewhat overlooked the pure metal in Bible teachings and in the Christian religion; but it has been the dross he has striven with zeal and earnestness (by no means with inappropriately reverential calm) to purge away, the worthless alloys he has endeavored to burn out with the fire of his fervid words.

The time will come when the teachings which seem to Mr. Gladstone wanting in reverence, will be more justly valued. Hypocrisies and cruelties, which are now regarded as the expression of religious fervor, will be seen in their true light, and utterances warm from a tender and generous heart against the cruelty and intolerance born of superstition, will be seen to be the expression of the truest reverence, to teach the worthiest religion of which man is capable.

The Clergy on the Rampage.

The articles on the decadence of church attendance, accompanied with tables and statistics of actual count, hav attracted largely the attention of the clergy. The statements which I hav made are simply matters of current history, as are also the various essays in more than a score of papers, copied largely in the village journals of the country. Now, what is the reply made in "ministers' meetings," and by clergy on the platform, or in the press?

I giv a sample. Dr. McArthur says in a speech before the state convention of the Young Men's Christian Association of New Jersey: "There are men who say the church is losing power, is not keeping progress with the age. They say the pulpit is waning. Poor ignorant creatures! They do not read; they do not keep their eyes open. There are certain writers for newspapers and magazines, notably one a little while ago, who say, 'Why don't people go to church?' If you went there yourself, you would see it; but he does not go."

We do know, and in the only way of really knowing, and that is by actual count, made by gentlemen as veracious and competent as Dr. McArthur. So the tables and statistics of many cities, towns, and communities hav been made and published, and are authorities upon the question; as the unsupported assertion of any individual is of no weight or value whatever. Indeed, in such a discussion as the present, if Dr. McArthur cannot find a single fact or figure—as he does not—to support his dropsical individual assertions, the inference is inevitable that he can furnish no statistical fact, reference, or citation whatever to support his statements. Nor will he prop his assertions, with those who do read and think, by speaking of such men and writers as Lord Macaulay, Froude, Scherer, Coloni, Behme, Schem, etc., as "poor ignorant creatures!" Why cannot such questions of such gravity and importance be candidly examined and the results given, as has been done by a multitude of the most eminent scholars of the day, without calling from the clergy the only reply, "Poor ignorant creatures?"

Our leading poets, historians, editors, essayists, scientists, philanthropists, and reformers are of the "poor ignorant creatures who do not read" the bitter denunciations of the sectarian press, nor take as infallible the bubbling rhetoric of the pulpit.

Such speeches as Dr. McArthur's tend all the more to make churches self-complaisant. Let them hav the history and facts of all things as they are. Giv them tables, statistics, all information as to the real condition of society and the wants of the world; work, humane, reformatory, is needed everywhere.

Following Dr. McArthur's speech, and on the same platform, R. E. Speer, of Princeton, said, speaking of the last century: "Dr. Johnson says the population of the heathen world has increased during that same time over 200,000,000. While Christianity has won one, paganism has won seventy. Africa stretches out her hands for more laborers and we send instead nine millions of gallons of liquor." Let facts be known; this will lead to endeavor if anything will. Statistics hav been given for this purpose. So with the exposure of dens, gambling saloons, etc., owned and rented by churches and church-members, as we wish to save our young men from Bible drinking and pious drunkenness which flows from the Crosby theology and religion. Professor Oswald's History of Christianity.

Saladin in London Secular Review.

We desire to recommend to the attention of our readers "The Secret of the East," by Prof. Felix L. Oswald, published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York. No book, in the same compass, givs a better abstract of the history of the Christian upas-tree from its seed-germ to its arborial maturity and its decline and decay. Like all students of comparativ sacerdotal mythologies and esoterics, Professor Oswald finds the Christian upas-tree to antedate immeasurably the era of the Galilean preacher from whom the vulgar deem it has its origin and name. Sakyamuni of India, not Jesus of Palestine, is the founder of the faith which to-day in Christendom enlists the credence of the more ignorant among the masses, and secures the conventional support of the more diplomatic among the classes. Professor Oswald is an able and absolutely fearless Antichristian. His facts are relevant and well-digested, his grasp of philosophical generalization bold and masterly, and his literary style is strong and captivating, but disciplined and cultured, and singularly free of sensationalism, hysterics, and eccentricity. We hope to be able to find space to quote his chapter, "The Night of the Middle Ages."

Naturalism vs. Mysticism Among the German Youth.

Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in Home Knowledge.

Instead of wasting time in the hopeless attempt to turn their young rogues into Trappists, our German contemporaries effect a speedier, if not better conversion, by turning them into young naturalists. Natural histories, books of travel, and hunting adventures hav almost delivered Germany from the sensation novels that hold their own against the saintliest products of the Sabbath press. Nor are the advantages of that surrogate limited to theoretical enjoyments. I hav seen Rhineland cottages where every boy of a hundred had a collection of natural curiosities—minerals, sea shells, stuffed birds and squirrels, botanic oddities, corals, and insects—a little private museum supplied by constant excursions that furnished a sufficient vent for a surplus of energies which might otherwise hav been apt to explode in deviltry. From an orthodox point of view, Baxter's "Saint's Rest" may seem preferable to all the works of Humboldt and Darwin, but for the purposes of practical morality it might be well to remember the physiological fact that the mere sight of a sanctified treatis will start the cold sweat of dismay from the skin of the same boy who would gladly accept an invitation to a butterfly hunt.

Fete to a Free-thought Martyr.

The London Times correspondent writes from Naples, June 12th: "The long-expected fête in honor of Giordano Bruno, the philosopher of Nolano, was celebrated last Sunday with great enthusiasm. The prefect of the province was among the earliest arrivals, thus showing the participation of the government in the objects of the meeting. Then came trains bearing carriages full of sympathizing visitors, of individuals and associations representing advanced views. Several letters were read from the prime minister, Signor Crispi, and Charles Bradlaugh, well known for his determination in urging on the House of Commons the abolition of the religious oath, and for having presided at the last conference of Freethinkers. 'I offer,' says the latter, 'my tribute to the fearless advocate, to the great thinker, to the far-seeing philosopher, to the noble martyr for Freethought.' Signor Crispi, in his letter to the syndic of Nolano, writes: 'I should be delighted to find myself in this meeting of citizens at such a solemn manifestation of the national sentiment, but the cares of state and my health not yet restored forbid it.' These are the only letters which hav been published among many others, all showing how far and wide is the sympathy felt with the celebration of the fête in honor of Giordano Bruno. All the principal journals of Italy were represented and the man who at the close of the sixteenth century was burnt on the Campo de Fiori was glorified three centuries later in such a way as his most enthusiastic admirers never could hav expected."

Christianity and Slavery.

Attention has been directed to passages from a speech by Wendell Phillips delivered at Boston, Jan. 27, 1853: "The theaters in many of our large cities bring out, night after night, all the radical doctrins and all the startling scenes of 'Uncle Tom.' They preach immediate emancipation, and slaves shoot their hunters to loud applause. Two years ago, sitting in this hall, I was myself somewhat startled by the assertion of my friend, Mr. Pillsbury, that the theaters would receive the gospel of antislavery truth earlier than the churches. A hiss went up from the galleries, and many in the audience were shocked by the remark. I asked myself whether I could indorse such a statement, and felt that I could not. I could not believe it to be true. Only two years hav passed, and what was then deemed rant and fanaticism by seven out of ten who heard it, has proved true. The theater, bowing to its audience, has preached immediate emancipation, and given us the whole of 'Uncle Tom;' while the pulpit is either silent or hostil, and in the columns of the theological papers the work is subjected to criticism, to reproach, and its author to severe rebuke. . . . At the early period to which I hav referred, the church was much exercised by the persistency of the Abolitionists in not going out from her. When I joined the antislavery ranks, sixteen years ago, the voice of the clergy was: 'Will these pests never leave us? Will they still remain to trouble us? If you do not like us, there is the door.'" Of William Lloyd Garrison Mr. Phillips said: "A fervid disciple of the American church, he conferred with some of the leading clergy in the city and laid before them his convictions on the subject of slavery. He recognized the colossal strength of the clergy. He entreated them to take up the cause. But they shut their doors upon him."

The World-Curse in Spain.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A short time since. I found the inclosed leaves in an old history. They in some respects describe the condition of our society as well as that of Spain one hundred years ago, and show that the clergy of those days were nearly as bad as the gospel-sharps of to-day. I cannot giv the name or date of the book, as the pages were torn out and the book lost more than thirty years ago. W. E. Scott.

Townshend, Vt., June 29, 1888.

Oppression has debased the Spaniards less than superstition. The king could not for a day oppress the subjects, which it is his duty to protect, but for the aid of the clergy, whose influence over the people commences at childhood and ends only with life. The clergy, though ignorant, hav yet the instinct of ignorance, and perceive that their power would be reduced in a people brought up in knowledge and virtue. Every effort of genius is therefore discouraged, for philosophy is no friend of fanaticism, and poetry has noble aspirations. The schools are in ecclesiastical hands, and the confessional givs even a greater influence to the clergy. To a priest no door is closed and no secret is hidden.

The Spaniards hav a hereditary contempt for trade, and agriculture cannot flourish in a country without roads. There are few chances, then, that labor will hav its reward. Their very virtues are politically oppressed, while their vices may lead them to honor and preferment. To be honest and true, to express their opinions boldly and freely, will but lead to captivity or banishment; but to dissemble in religion, to feign bigotry if they hav it not, to show outward reverence to friars whom they may despise in their hearts, is the much-traveled road to safety and shame. There are, indeed, many who neither reverence a dissolute monk nor honor a fanatic and faithless king; but they conceal their sentiments, as they love liberty and life. The Spaniards hav been called indolent, but this is a calumny; and yet many of them liv in idleness; for few men will much care to sow where they may not be sure to reap.

In Spain, those whose duty it is to be the censors and conservators of public morals, are the corruptors. The flock is indeed unhappy when the shepherd has an understanding with the wolf. The celibacy of the clergy has made them dissolute, and they hav spread depravity over the land. Of all classes in the country, perhaps that which has the least pretension to purity is the clergy. Ferdinand would not sign a warrant for the execution of an ecclesiastic. It is but a few years since that a priest, who had conceived a passion for a lady that was contracted to another, murdered her at the confessional. The ferocious wretch, who afterward expressed his joy that another should not possess her, was punished by an easy imprisonment.

In 1826, there were 1 233 convictions for murder, 1,775 for attempts to murder, and 1 620 for robbery, while the actual crimes were perhaps many more than the convictions. At Seville is a hospital for the relief of such as are wounded in sudden frays or by assassins; the seat on which the patient is placed is called the "bully's chair." A traveler relates, that in one week of his residence twenty-one were carried to this hospital, exclusiv, probably, of those who were killed outright, or who had homes of their own.

There are few establishments in Spain for the diffusion of the first rudiments of knowledge. The lower classes seldom learn to read and write; and those above them are as seldom instructed in anything but reading, writing, and arithmetic. There are eleven universities, but they are very far behind the literary institutions of other European countries. There is, indeed, little encouragement for education, or even safety for learning, in a country, of which it has been truly remarked, that to learn the names of its best scholars and finest geniuses, we need only to go to the dungeons of the Inquisition. The books which it is the policy to spread are lives of saints, deaths of martyrs, and the legends of the eleven thousand virgins.

The contents of the newspapers may be surmised from the nature of the books. There are few, however, of any kind. The capital boasts of the Gazette and the Diario, or Daily, small quarto sheets, mainly taken up with the names of the saints whose festivals fall on that day. Under the saints' days the following notice has its turn: "To-morrow will be celebrated the feast of the glorious martyr, San Poncio, advocate and protector against bed-bugs." The Gazette commences by announcing the health and occupation of their majesties, and inserts the quantity and kind of news that is pleasing to the government.

The Moors in Spain were so polished and gentle a people that their expulsion was a national calamity. They had a library at Cordova of six hundred thousand volumes, and there were seventy public libraries in the Andalusian kingdom. This was at a time when the rest of Europe was sunk in the deepest ignorance. Many Spanish Jews of great learning flourished at the same time.

The religion is strictly Roman Catholic. The number of archbishoprics is eight, and there are fifty-one bishoprics. The archbishop of Toledo is primate of Spain, and his income is nearly $450 000. There are thirty-two thousand females confined in cloisters. The king nominates to all ecclesiastical dignities, and even to the smaller benefices. The clergy are rich, ignorant, and dissolute. They are the most powerful body in Spain. They retain a strong hold upon the favor of the lower class, and distribute from monasteries daily alms or food to the poor. Yet they giv back but little of what they receive, and a monk passes a life of indolence and abundance in Spain.

I'll giv thee, good fellow, a twelvemonth or twain,
To search Europe through from Byzantium to Spain;
But ne'er shall you find, should you search till you tire,
So happy a man as the barefooted friar.

He's expected at noon, and no wight ere he comes
May profane the great chair or the porridge of plums;
For the best of the cheer and the seat at the fire
Is the undenied right of the barefooted friar.

In Spain, however, the clergy hav greater privileges than those recounted in the song. They hold the power of superstition over ignorance, and make it the means of an immense revenue. There is not in Spain a wretch so poor that he does not pay something to the church. The Bull of the Crusade is a document more generally sold than stamps are in England. It is founded on a supposition that there is a continual war waging with the Infidels. The virtues of this bull expire at the end of a year, when it is necessary to purchase another. One-half of the proceeds go to the king, and never was bigotry so well taxed or an imposture more cheerfully paid. This bull, among other things, concedes permission to eat eggs, milk, and butter during Lent; and no priest is so ignorant of his craft that he will administer the sacrament or grant absolution to anyone who has not the Bull of the Crusade.

The Flesh Bull is more expensiv, as it is intended chiefly for the rich, who are made to pay roundly for eating flesh in the interdicted seasons. The Bull of the Dead is a passport required at all burials, and without it no priest will officiate. Marriages, christenings, absolutions, and funerals swell the wealth of the church, and there is a profitable trade in masses. Those who die pass their last hours under the eye of the church, and the ghostly advisers often suggest a bequest to the convent, to found a perpetual mass for the departing soul. The friends of the deceased readily purchase masses to shorten his abode in purgatory. Generally a Spaniard is very tender in this point, and never refuses to giv when solicited "for the souls." Societies are formed in every town for these suffering spirits, and there was a lottery scheme invented for them, in which the pious adventurer, by performing the penance inscribed on his ticket, might transfer the merit of it to some soul in purgatory. The pope has established certain days when every Spaniard may, by kneeling at five different altars and praying for the extinction of heresy. release the soul of a friend. The name of the soul must be mentioned, to prevent mistakes; but, if not, the prayer is addressed "for the most worthy and the most disconsolate."

The revenues of the clergy are swelled by the sale of relics, consecrated beads, crucifixes, scourges, etc. The relics are numerous; generally the bones of saints. At Oviedo the highest church dignitary shows the rod of Moses, the mantle of Elias, the oliv branch borne by the savior, a great part of the cross, eight thorns of the crown, a vial of the Virgin's milk, and the hood she gave to the archbishop of Toledo.

Whenever the little bell is heard, which accompanies the host or sacrament going to the dying, all who hear it kneel and utter a prayer. At theaters, balls, and in the mud of the streets, there is no exception; all who hear it must remain kneeling till the sound is past, and to refuse would incur danger from the populace. The play stops, and the actors kneel upon the stage, as well as the audience in the boxes, when, however, the sound is heard in bed, it is only necessary to sit upright.

After Castile was united with Aragon by the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella, the modern Inquisition was established over Spain from the year 1481. The king was a bigot, but in this he had not even the excuse of bigotry; he thirsted for the property of the Jews. It was a successful, and to him not an objectionable way of filling the treasury. The gentle and good Isabella, the friend of Columbus, the protector of the Indians, refused to permit the Inquisition to be established in Castile, but her confessor, Torquemada, overcame her scruples. The first destruction scattered by this infernal engin was among the Jews. A hundred thousand families emigrated, many professed Christianity, and almost all the new Christians began to emigrate to the lands of the duke of Medina Sidonia, marquis of Cadiz, and other noblemen. Torquemada, however, the head of the Inquisition, was too thirsty for blood to let them so easily escape, and it was declared, by proclamation of the holy office, that emigration should be held as sufficient proof of heresy. The proclamation ordered the noblemen before named to arrest the flying, and sequester their goods. The prisoners were more than the numerous convents could contain. Four days after the establishment of the Inquisition in Spain, six of the condemned were burnt, and ten more in a few days.

In less than six months 298 of these unfortunates were burnt at the stake in the single city of Seville. During the same time more than 2 000 of the condemned were delivered to the flames in other parts of the province. Among these were, of course, many persons of great wealth, and their riches only led them into danger. The prefect of Seville, to save time in the numerous executions, erected without the city a scaffolding of stone on which were raised four hollow statues of plaster. In these the newly relapsed Christians were slowly burnt. This scaffold was extant until the revolution of 1820. Many of these regulations were made to gratify the grasping disposition of the king, and the king, in return, was willing to barter his subjects' lives to the monks. The accused never saw those who testified against him. There was the mockery of a counsel allowed, yet he was not permitted to be seen alone, or to speak but to confess. Besides, what counselor would dare defend a prisoner in the Inquisition? The proceedings in these courts had little delay, though there were many long imprisonments; when there was any process, it was a summary one. In one year the Inquisition of Toledo finished 3,327 trials. There were but two inquisitors and two registers to perform this labor. When the tribunal had become well established it had its spies all over Spain. There was no safety. It was the reign of terror and suspicion; the Romans, under Tiberius, were less to be pitied than the Spaniards under Ferdinand and Torquemada.

The prisons of the Inquisition were so damp, that the mats and cloths soon decayed. The prisoners were literally crammed in them; those who came forth were walking skeletons, while others confessed all they were charged with, to escape from such confinement by death.

In the chamber of torment, every person accused, who refused to confess, received his trial. This was deep under the ground, and lighted by two flickering flambeaux, which, with their unsteady light, increased the gloom of the dungeons. The inquisitors and executioners were clothed in long robes of sackcloth, and their faces were covered with hoods of the same, having holes cut for their eyes. The poor sufferer could not even look up in a human face, for a vain search after mercy in its lineaments. The refusal to confess was the signal for the torture. This was applied in three ways, by the cord, by fire, and by water. In the first mode, the hands were tied behind the back of the prisoner, by means of a cord passed over a pulley above his head. He was raised by the cord as high as the roof, where he was permitted to hang for some time, when the rope was suddenly relaxed, and he fell within a foot and a half of the ground. This dislocated all the joints, and the cord entered to the sinews. This punishment was renewed every hour, till the sufferer was left without strength or motion; when he was remanded to his cell, to die or to revive for a punishment more horrible. In the second trial, the patient was stretched and tied on a wooden spout so contrived as to bend his back and raise his feet above his head; this much impeded respiration. The executioner then introduced at the bottom of the throat a piece of fine linen, a part of which covered the nostrils; poured water into the mouth and nose, and left it to filter, so slowly that an hour passed before the sufferer could swallow a drop, although it trickled constantly. There was no interval for respiration. He attempted constantly to swallow, hoping to giv passage to a little air, which the linen constantly prevented. The linen was often, when taken from the throat, stained with the blood of vessels ruptured in this attempt to breathe. Besides this, at every moment a powerful arm turned a lever, and made the cords on the arms and legs penetrate even to the bones. Fire was the next means employed to make the accused criminate himself. The feet were rubbed with oil and lard, and placed before the fire till they were so roasted that the bones and sinews appeared. Death was a relief, and confession gratified the inquisitors at last. Few of the tortured ever returned to tell the hideous secrets of their prison.

The condemned were executed at an Auto-dâ fé—Act of Faith—which was both general and particular. The former took place on great occasions, as the accession of a prince, his marriage, or the birth of an infanta. This was reserved as an offering worthy to be presented to a king. A balcony of great extent was erected, in which the seat of the grand inquisitor was placed above that of the king, who was surrounded by grandees and ladies of the court.

There was a long procession, ecclesiastical and lay, in which the prisoners came last, many of whom were gagged. The condemned were shut up in a pen, and each one knelt as his sentence was read. The grand inquisitor then surrendered all who were to be executed, to the secular arm, and they were conducted to the place of burning, or Quemadero. Here there were as many funeral piles as victims. Napoleon suppressed the Inquisition, and Ferdinand revived it. But public opinion had, even in Spain, become too strong for it to exist. In 1820, when the popular outbreak restored the constitution, the people everywhere rose against the Inquisition, forced the gates, delivered the prisoners, and demolished the dungeons and instruments of torture. From 1481 to 1820, the number burnt alive was 34 658, and the number of others condemned to the galleys or imprisonment, 288,214.

The dead are buried in Spain in the dress of a Franciscan or Dominican, with the hands holding a crucifix; children under seven years old are supposed to be taken at once to heaven, and their funerals are celebrated like joyful events, with festivity, and the ringing of bells.

Spain was long an absolute monarchy, in which the power of the king had no limits but the slender barrier that public opinion could, in a country without education or a press, interpose. The title of Most Catholic Majesty which was granted by the pope to Ferdinand in 1496, has been continued to the succeeding sovereigns. In the king's title are enumerated all territories which he holds, or at any time has held.

Either the spirit or the administration of the laws must be defectiv, for neither life nor property is universally safe. There are several ancient codes, and the civil and canon laws hav some authority. Justice, in Spain, carries with it more terror than mercy; and is avoided as a pestilence. The clergy often interfere, to obtain the pardon of an offender; but when he has no friend among the notaries or clergy, the execution of justice is generally certain and severe. Thus die the patriots as well as the malefactors of Spain, and thus perished Riego.

Cremation.

Do we wish our bodily remains, and those of our friends, to become inmates of those vast charnel-house pantheons, or portions of those vaster reeking masses of corruption, our cemeteries, where the repulsiv loathsomeness of their protracted putrefaction is so offensiv to contemplate; or do we wish these bodies subjected to the beautiful and refining process of incineration; that is, of the pure, quick, and decorous conversion of them into their original elements by heat—"refining them as by fire"—according to scriptural injunction, in a rosy glow of heat and light, after which naught remains that is repulsiv to sight or touch, but only a few handfuls of a pure white ash, incorruptible, and suitable to be kept in beautiful urns, in our homes, or in memorial halls, or mausoleums as grand, or more so if we will, as the one built by the faithfully devoted Artemisia over the ashes of the remains of her husband King Mausolus?

The voice of science answers unhesitatingly and emphatically in favor of the latter method of their disposal. Sanitary science shows that the burial of the dead is an injury to the living, an unpardonable injury and offense, a stupid blunder. Earth, water, and air are charged by our burial-grounds with poisonous gases and disease-engendering germs by which sickness and death are strewn broadcast. There emanate from these bodies not only these general deleterious influences, but also, from those having been afflicted with infectious disease, the particular bacteria peculiar to the disease, which are specially fatal.

It is stated by high authority that "the poisons of scarlet fever, typhoid fever, small-pox, diphtheria, malignant cholera, are undoubtedly transmissible through earth from the buried body by more than one mode. And thus by the act of interment we literally sow broadcast through the land innumerable seeds of pestilence; germs which long maintain their vitality, many of them destined at some future time to fructify in premature death and ruined health for thousands." What a reproach to our civilization!

The Right Hon. Sir Lyon Playfair, R C.B., M P., writing of the "Disposal of the Dead," says: "In most of our churchyards the dead are harming the living by destroying the soil, fouling the air, contaminating water or springs, and spreading the seeds of disease." Sir Henry Thompson says: "No dead body is ever placed in the soil without polluting the earth, the air, and the water above and about us." That grand and remarkable man and scientist, Pasteur, has proved by experiments that "earthworms bring to the surface myriads of bacteria from the bodies of the decomposing dead."

The Rev. J. D. Beugless says Dr. Domingo Freire, of Rio de Janeiro, while investigating the causes of a recent epidemic of yellow fever, "came upon the dreadful fact that the soil of the cemeteries in which the victims of the outbreak were buried was positivly alive with microbian organisms exactly identical with those found in the vomitings and blood of those who had died in the hospitals of yellow fever." The plague of Modena in 1828 was shown by Professor Bianahi to be due to excavations made where victims of the plague were interred three hundred years before; and the terrible violence of the cholera in London, in 1854, is charged to the upturning of the soil wherein the plague-stricken of 1665 were buried. I could add pages of like testimony, but what need to multiply further?

Economic science is also as decidedly in favor of cremation. This is too evident to need demonstration. So is moral science. Good old common sense, too, indorses it. Reason indorses it. Esthetics indorses it. Cleanliness, purity, good taste, refinement, culture, indorse it. Says the Nineteenth Century, through its editor: "Cremation givs truth and reality to the grand and solemn words, 'Ashes to ashes and dust to dust,' and the impressiv service, with slight change, will be read with a fulness of meaning never conveyed before. The last rite has purified the body; its elements of physical evil hav been annihilated by fire. Already its dispersed constituents, having escaped the long imprisonment of the tomb, pursue their eternal circuit in harmony with nature's uniform and perfect course."

Burial is suggestiv of semi-civilization; or rather it was a state of semi-civilization that suggested burial. The practice was born of the emotions unguided and unaided by reason and experience. It was and is, therefore, unscientific. It comes from blind impulse, as does emotional charity. And as experience and reason hav shown us the unwisdom and folly of such charity, and are leading us rather into rational and scientific charity, so let them help us to see the worse than foolishness—may I not say criminality?—of this blind, emotional, irrational method of the disposal of our friends' and our own bodies, and lead us into this really rational and scientific, and, withal, chaste and delightsome, system of cremation. To refuse or neglect to be so guided is to act irrationally, to sin against ourselvs and our neighbors, and to commit a crime against future generations.

To practice cremation is but to avail ourselvs of one of the resources of civilization.

To believe in it and to practice it is to act wisely and righteously for ourselvs, our children, and our children's children, not only "to the third and fourth generations,' but to all future generations.

Let those who are disposed to obey the scriptural injunction, "Come let us reason together," and are, or think they are, in favor of burial, undertake to giv the "reason for the faith that is in them," and see which side they will be on after the discussion. Such reflection, however, even without discussion, I believe would suffice to convince anyone who will pause and take the trouble, of his own error. But "the trouble is," even in most matters, but especially in a matter like this, that most people do not reflect; they havn't the time to stop to reflect, or the disposition or the capacity to do so, but go blundering on and on, groping their way through life and death alike in the darkness of the shadows of mere instinct, generation after generation. Nevertheless,

> A soul without reflection,
> Like a pile without inhabitants,
> To ruin runs.

And the victims of the error or blunder of burial, like all other victims of error, must suffer the consequences thereof, for it is natural law or method that they should suffer, and these laws are immutable; and when these consequences will hav convinced them of their error and driven them to believe in and to practice cremation, they will see that these laws are, on the whole, also beneficent, and that it is alike our highest duty and best interest to work in harmony with them, and practice cremation.

A Freethought Funeral Address.

A short time since, a poor mother said to me that her daughter was very sick, and she feared she would die. And she said it was her wish and the desire of her daughter that I would say a few words at the funeral. Of course I could not refuse to comply with such a request, coming from a sobbing mother. But, as I expected to be absent, I suggested it might be well to select something from Mr. Ingersoll's writings, and hav some one read it when wanted. But afterward I concluded to write the following article, and I offer it to the readers of The Truth Seeker, that they may see that almost anyone can write, or get some one to write, something that may be read, without troubling the clergy, who profess to believe that all unbelievers will be and ought to be eternally damned. M. Babcock.

St. Johns, Mich.

My Friends: You hav assembled to pay your last respects to the dead, the same as some day others will assemble to pay their last respects to you. I hav prepared a few words by request of the deceased, for the reason that she liked my ideas better than the ideas of those who profess to believe that for the few mistakes made in this world there will be eternal punishment in the next.

The deceased was twenty-five years old. She had endured her full share of suffering, then death kindly came to her relief, and now she is at rest. And, after all, life is hardly worth the living. There is a little sunshine for some, but for the masses it seems to be almost one continual struggle for an existence, till death comes to their relief, after which they are soon forgotten. But the great question is, After death, what?

Superstition has given the world many religions, some believing one way and some another, and some believe that everybody who does not believe their way ought to suffer forever in the next world. Now, almost any religion that, without being unjust to others, will make us better and happier, is a pretty good religion; and the one that has the most humanity, charity, and mercy, and that most loves justice, with a desire to do good unto others, is the best one among them all, and I care not what else it holds, or if it holds the Bible to be of divine origin or not.

Now, I hav great respect for our so-called orthodox friends so far as they are honest, for as a rule they are a pretty good and a well-meaning people; but, as they never hav been able to agree among themselvs, they ought not to blame others for not being able to agree with them. They hold that an unbeliever can not be saved, and yet, according to Matthew, Christ was of a different opinion, for he forgave those who were about to put him to death; he did not ask or care what they believed; he knew they were unbelievers, who would murder him for the reason that they did not believe him to be the son of God, and yet he forgave them, and forgave them without being asked.

I hav said this much only to show that though the church may hav been against the deceased on account of her unbelief, yet she had Christ's last and most noble act to sustain her in the right to do her own thinking and to be governed by her own private judgment. The clergy admit and lament that all the while Infidelity keeps spreading, but what is Infidelity? Spiritualism is Infidelity—so the deceased was an Infidel. Unitarianism is Infidelity. All churches and all religions who believe, if there is a God, he is not so bad as represented by the Presbyterian church, are Infidels in the estimation of that particular church.

But, after all that has been said and done, the great question, Does death end all? to-day as in all ages of the past still remains a question on which good men differ in their opinions. Ingersoll has said, "Death is a mystery which we cannot understand." The deceased believed, as I understand, that death is but a stepping-stone from this life to a brighter and better life in the spirit-land, where she and all will be better off than they were while living in this life.

If Spiritualism be true, this should be a time for rejoicing rather than sorrow. Even the mourners might decorate themselvs with gay ribbons and flowers, for the one they loved has gone to a better place. But supposing that, after all, orthodoxy, with its doctrin of a possible eternal punishment for the most of us, shall prove to be true, why, then there should be a great change, and we never again should permit for one moment a smile to illuminate our faces. Now, I hav tried to say this much in the spirit of kindness. I hav given the two systems, and you can take your choice. But if we must believe in either, let us try to believe in the one that has the most humanity.

Now, if there is to be an existence after death, when we reflect that there are a thousand religions, all the result of locality and education, all differing in their opinions, and all thinking that they know so much, when, in fact, they know so little, it makes me come to the conclusion that, even if all are mistaken, not one among them all ever should be or ever will be punished in the next world for having been mistaken while living in this world. So you see that I am inclined to be more charitable toward my orthodox friends than they are toward me.

The sorrowing mother, being poor, cannot afford to erect a costly monument at the grave of the one whom she loved, but it may be that she will shed more tears over her grave than the rich shed over the graves where stand the most lofty monuments. You can no more measure a man's grief by the hight of the monument that he has placed at his wife's grave than you can estimate the widow's grief by the amount of crape she wears at her husband's funeral. Of course, I may be wrong, but when I see a woman wearing an excessiv quantity of crape, I always pity her from the bottom of my heart, for it seems to me that she has lost some dear friend and she fears that her friend, although good, was not quite good enough to be saved. And I want to tell you that that kind of religion is a mistaken theology.

The deceased was not rich as to this world's goods, but I would a thousand times sooner hav poverty with her belief than riches with a belief that I hav a son who is now being tortured, and to be tortured forever, for his honest unbelief in the orthodox creed. The deceased, though poor, had a pretty good religion, and she had the consolation of knowing that she had a loving mother and a loving sister who were willing to do all they could for her, and watch over her till her last struggle was at an end and her eyes closed in death.

Our next and last duty is to consign her lifeless form to the silent grave and bid it a last and long farewell.

The Christian Religion Had a Natural Origin.

We hav been accustomed to divide progress into epochs, and mark the advance of the world by certain intellectual or moral revolutions. We trace the upward steps through periods of growth and date the birth of reforms from the lives or efforts of particular persons. This method answers the object of the biographer, whose aim is to emphasize the greatness of certain individuals; but the general historian, whose purpose is to follow the evolution of ideas and principles as well as to describe the events and circumstances attending human life, must be guided by a different motiv. We are led to look for the origin of any comprehensiv moral movement far back of the age when this movement became defined in individual character sufficient to attract general attention and when the principles underlying it took definit and permanent forms.

There must be a historical perspectiv to fitly represent personal grandeur. A Washington could not hav been produced by the political situations of China or Egypt. A sufficient national basis is essential to a great public performance.

As with persons so with ideas. Whenever any great moral victory has been achieved, such triumph has not been a miracle. There must be adequate and defining causes for every success of mankind. We must not forget that in the wondrous beauty of the flower are the contributions of the leaf, the stalk, the earth, the air, the rain, and the sun. All the material influences of earth are necessary to the perfection of vegetable existence. Can we expect moral excellence or mental attainment on a basis narrower than that upon which we assert physical superiority? The whole human race furnishes the mind of man, and all nature supports the structure of human achievement.

It is plain that the complex civilization of this age is the result of human development, and as our humanity may be traced to an obscure commencement, so the various mental and moral streams that run in majestic course through human society hav their springs in far-distant nations and among long-forgotten peoples. Not only were there prehistoric races of men, but there were prehistoric moral endeavors, whose early attempts are felt in the life of man to-day.

We hav been taught to believe that the great moral revolution which succeeded paganism had its origin in supernatural events, and that a leader of this revolt was provided in a supernatural manner. But the fact lies in direct opposition to such a faith. The mind, when it rejected the pagan gods, had outgrown the notion of supernatural events, and had protested against a supernatural order of things. We are forced to believe that the character of Christ, which has been assigned as the inspiration of the world in its renunciation of paganism, was but the ghost of the expiring mythology, and that, instead of leading the movement for a better religion and a higher life, it followed and retarded it, and finally was the cause of its decline.

Wherever in history we find a miracle projected into human economy to explain any manifestation or result, we may confidently deny that any such manifestation or result was ever produced. There exist material forces potent enough to account for any natural occurrence which the historian has found. Miracles are introduced to explain the impossible, the false. They are the apologies of deceptions, the masks of lies. All that has really taken place in the course of human history as the product of the human mind or under the direction and influence of mental or moral power, has had a natural origin. No man has been equipped with more than a natural power or has drawn from any source but human nature his strength, his skill, his eloquence, his virtue.

We may account for the highest character, for the noblest life, for the purest moral aspiration of the human heart, by the law of evolution. We need not add divine illumination to human intelligence to explain the origin of the Christian religion. We can not discover any necessity for interference on the part of the deity to write the books of the New Testament.

A great many better and abler works hav been written by men. To account for the first century of the Christian era, we hav only to go back of it; and to account for the uprising against paganism, we need only to understand what it meant.

Instead of believing that the Christian religion had a divine origin, we are more inclined to think that it had a devilish one.

There was evidently a demand for a better religion than was found in the pagan temples. The philosophers had taught a purer morality than the priests. This morality was the inspiration of a nobler literature and a higher civilization. A great moral convulsion shook the heathen world, and out of the agitation which followed came a new life to mankind. That life was checked and choked by a superstition. A pure philosophy of human existence was sacrificed to a foolish faith. No greater calamity has ever befallen the human race than the birth of the Christian superstition. Ancient Rome destroyed the Jewish nation, but the ghost of Israel's ambition has survived, and has haunted the world's thought for nearly two thousand years.

The rapid growth of the superstition that Jesus was the messiah, who had been looked for by the Jews, overshadowed the great moral revolution which was going on among the people, and finally checked its progress. Three centuries after the birth of this superstition we find that it had absorbed, so far as it was able to do so, the moral power, and appropriated the moral precepts which had aroused the human mind to new conceptions of duty. As Christianity spread, intelligence declined; and when this superstition became the dominant faith of mankind in the western world, it blew out the lights of knowledge and left the world in darkness.

Incidental or Essential.

Christians occasionally exhibit some piece of good their system seems to hav done. A little thought should be taken before allowing that Christianity merits credit for any good thing whatever.

No institution whatever can exist on a vast-spreading scale for many centuries without doing some good occasionally—or, rather, without some good being done by its members. During its long existence, over all its wide extent, there will occur impingements between it and innumerable other institutions, movements, and persons. Of necessity, among all these accidental encounters, some will by chance result in good. All cannot result in evil. The defenders of the institution, then, need only trumpet aloft their purely incidental, unintended instances of good, and an ignorant populace, unable to discriminate, see in them convincing proofs of the essential worth of the institution.

Christians say their religion preserved civilization at the time of the fall of the Roman empire. That faith, they say, held together the European peoples and enabled them to repel the Eastern invaders who would hav conquered the nations separately.

In the first place, the correctness of this statement may be disputed historically.

In the second place, even if it is true, we are not so certain that the Eastern nations might not hav turned out quite as respectable citizens of Europe as the mad and bloody-minded fanatics who made that country a bedlam and slaughter-pen for thirteen centuries. We are not certain that had they come Italy and Spain would not be better off to-day.

But, in the third place, if Christianity did hold together the Western nations, what of it, anyway? The effect was purely a chance one. In fact, their success lay only in a secular common sense disregarding the non-resistance tenet of the religion, which, if it really had been obeyed, would hav been fatal. Any institution would hav answered as well in the place. Suppose we get up an institution now for any purpose—no matter what or how absurd—say, to forward the use of the color blue, and insist on everyone wearing it, and by means of its uniting influence our nations withstand an invader, does that establish the transcendent merit of the color blue? Suppose an Indian raid is repulsed by a Freethinkers' convention that chanced to be held in the neighborhood, does this establish the truth or the general and necessary beneficence of Freethought? Let all learn to distinguish between the incidental and the essential; the casual and the causal; the accidental, unintended, and the specific, inherent, and necessary.

The same consideration applies to Christianity's claim of having aided the poor against the barons through the Middle Ages. It is unnecessary to bring forward this claim, or any such claim. A little broad reasoning on general principles is enough to assure us, without any direct records, that the church dignitaries would find it sometimes expedient to espouse the people's cause against the barons. In fact, when we recollect how much trouble the prelates had in their demands for money in making the barons come down, we wonder it did not happen oftener than it did. It has nothing to do with the legitimate nature and effects of Christianity, anyway.

It is the same with the Christian espousal of benevolent functions. Charity has to be performed by an organization. Freethought, not having an organization, could not do it. Christianity had an organization, and the purely human motivs of the members, together with a perception that this would be an effectiv means of proselyting, caused them to adopt it.

No, it would be a great mistake to credit with any responsible good whatever the unmitigated world-curse Christianity. Of essential, legitimate good, peculiar to itself and capable of being done by no other, it has done none. Of incidental, irresponsible, unintended good, every institution must unavoidably hav done some, no matter how hard it may hav tried not to; to Christianity belongs the proud distinction of having, out of all known systems, done the very least possible.

The War Spirit of Europe.

The spectacle presented by the civilized nations of the day is one almost compelling a denial of reasoning powers to a majority of the human race. An onlooker from a strange planet would see on the continent of Europe a multitude of creatures—of human beings. Occasionally here and there he would see a wrong attempted by one to another. The offender would be seen seized, carried off, confined, perhaps put to death. All would go on as before. On a sudden, such a wrong would be followed by extraordinary proceedings. A great tumult would rise, the creatures from uttermost distances would be seen swarming together to pierce one another with pieces of metal, and destroy one another by thousands. What was the cause? Why, this particular wrong was committed, unlike the other, on a spot called a boundary line. This line possesses mysterious properties. The creatures on the respectiv sides of this imaginary line wear hats of different shapes, coats of different cuts and colors, and also speak a different language. When a being with a square cap and using certain sounds to designate particular objects has trouble with a being wearing a round cap and using other sounds for purposes of indication, instead of settling the matter in the usual way, all beings with square caps rush fiercely upon all with round caps, and all with round caps upon all with square caps, until the square-capped ones hav destroyed the round-capped, or the round-capped hav destroyed the square-capped. Why could not this quarrel hav been settled, like the other, in the ordinary fashion at the nearest court? Goodness knows. Or the destroying may be commenced at any time without the preliminary of an individual offense. "Sometimes the quarrel between two princes is to decide which of them shall dispos-

sess a third of his dominions, where neither of them pretends to any right. Sometimes one prince quarrels with another, for fear the other should quarrel with him. Sometimes a war is entered upon because the enemy is too strong, and sometimes because he is too weak. Sometimes our neighbors want the things which we hav, or hav the things which we want, and both fight, till they take ours, or giv us theirs." Truly this is an extraordinary instinct. To a Rationalist, bred up on the pure and harmonious principles of reason, free from precedent and tradition and despising cant whether religious, military, or national, the motiv is incomprehensible.

Freethinkers should ever raise their voice against this extraordinary and horrible practice. Its evils are innumerable. Were standing armies and war expenses done away with, the hours of labor of the producers could be lessened a third. The whole effects of wars, and of the war spirit, are brutalizing and hindering to progress to the last degree. What the widows think of war no one has ever considered of sufficient consequence to inquire. When woman suffrage is obtained, we shall probably learn.

Christianity is intimately identified with the war spirit. Saying nothing of the wars that hav actually occurred over doctrinal points, it is observable that the conduct of all Christians when in places of authority, and the spirit of their whole literature and press, has been eminently rancorous and cruel. For centuries the Old Testament passages of blood and ferocity furnished English soldiers with texts for guidance and emulation and canting cut-throats, divided their time between fighting and doctrinal disputations over their pocket Bibles. With their mechanical pious cant, which nobody ever heeds, and which the speakers neither understand nor feel, nor urge in any practical case, Christian writers hav done nothing toward the extermination of war. Their works are full of its indirect glorification. While Voltaire was tirelessly heaping scorn on what he called the practice of "a concourse of animals with hats on their heads fighting for a person whom they never saw, to gain a land none of which they will ever see and no part of which they will ever own," the ecclesiastics were equipping regiments with consecrated colors and the prayer: "O my God, cause victory and death always to go before them!" Freethought has always demanded peace. Almost every Freethought writer has felt with his gentle and rational spirit the discord and hideousness of war, and inveighed at length against it. The Encyclopedists assailed the insanity with their every weapon of ridicule, invectiv, and logic. The Freethinkers of the French Revolution held aloft above every other principle that of the universal brotherhood and peace of mankind. Shelley, Byron, Spencer, Swinburne, Massey, Hugo, Goethe, are names the foremost among the assailants of the monstrous practice.

War, religion, and every other irrationality naturally sustain one another. The abolition of them all lies in the spread of science, of Freethought, of liberty, of all engentling influences, and humanitarian principles embracing all mankind.

Sunday.

In reading of ancient abuses, we often exclaim at the supineness of people that would suffer so much. We need not exclaim so much at them if we will look about to observe some samples of what we ourselvs can do in the line of abjectness when we try.

Habituation to an abuse dulls the perception of its enormity. What will be the opinion of future nations of happy Rationalists of that custom by which their progenitors, getting after six days of toil a chance on the seventh for a bit of merriment, duly handed over the arrangement of their lives that day to a part of the community a fraction in number, last in civilization, lowest in development, clamoring in peevish anger for deference to childish figments of weakly brains, who uniformly interdicted everything that they did want and commanded everything that they did not?

It would seem that the people hav had so little happiness that they hav forgotten its savor. If they could but half conceive how glorious and joyful our weekly holiday can be made, but half imagin the heart-cheering and healthful pleasures of which they are despoiled, they would not be restrained. Think of the difference between a day of travel, of excursions, of summer skies and emerald fields, of placid lakes and sounding groves, of grassy slopes bearing romping children and smiling friends; of childhood's laugh, woman's delighted glance, and heart-expanded tones of inspirited and cordial men, and a day of curtains and shadows, of monotony and gloom, of cramping houses and care-reminding walls. Think of a day of festivals and sports, of ball-room and concert, of opera and theater, of library and lecture hall, of museums filled with the instructiv and the strange and galleries with the beautiful and ennobling; and then of a day of church and pew, of whine and snuffle, of bugbear and chimera, of disordered whims and incomprehensible creeds, of damnation and death, of mysticism and lies, of the unintelligible and the incoherent, the maundering and the hideous, of attempts at insensibility, and uneasy yearnings, of soul-weariness and sunken hearts. Think of the difference between a Sunday spent in gaining a little reward for a week of endurance and longings, in giving the yearning heart something of a grateful glow that shall carry it warmed, contented, strengthened, and generous far into the next week's strivings, and a Sunday spent in depressing our spirits, paying professional enemies of human kind to repeat infinit nothings, and standing awaiting our masters' signal for return to work like a horse at a post.

Our Sunday laws must be resisted, evaded, and rendered invalid in every possible way. They are in direct contravention of the spirit and intention of our free government. It is well to hav a holiday. A secular law or agreement discontinuing most trades on a fixed day is very good. An ecclesiastical statute forbidding also all recreation, and those few occupations providing holiday pleasures for the mass of the workers, is something quite different. It is a piece of shameless insolence that must, we repeat, be resisted, evaded, and rendered invalid by any and every means in our power.

The British-American Association.

There is growing up in the United States a new power, which is not a party in a political sense, but which is destined to exert no little influence in the politics of America—the so-called British-American Association. This power is on the side of Liberalism where Liberalism touches the great public questions of citizenship and education. The public schools of this country hav no more intelligent defenders and no more ardent advocates and adherents than the British-Americans. From the inception of this movement, which to-day is a grand national organization, to the present hour, the danger to our school system has been clearly pointed out, and the enemies of our government hav been held up to the reprobation of all loyal citizens by the British-American Association. In fact, few papers in the land hav championed the cause of popular education more ably, or defied the foes of our common schools with more courage, than the press of this association; and it is a matter of gratulation among Liberals that they hav this powerful and able ally to assist in the great work of Secular emancipation.

The success of this organization is phenomenal. In its present shape it does not date back a twelvemonth. It would be interesting as a study in political affairs to trace this movement from its birth, and giv the successiv steps of growth which mark its progress and development. But this is not our purpose. We simply desire to indicate the force of ideas when backed up by intelligence and courage; and we know of no better illustration of the power of conviction, inspired by love of liberty, than is afforded by the British Association in America.

That there is a purpose, and that a defining one, back of this organization, goes without saying. That the movement was started to antagonize any religious or political party is not evident. But that a great and patriotic purpose permeates the association may be declared with truth. If the people of these United States need one thing more than another to-day it is a lesson in patriotism. That our British citizens hav set us this lesson should shame us into a nobler love of country, which will arouse the mind to the duties of the hour.

There is no greater evil in this land, no power that menaces our liberties more, than the Roman Catholic church. Who loves America must hate Rome. Nowhere is this ecclesiastical usurper more activ than in this country. Catholicism is failing in Mexico, France, and Italy; it is unpopular in Germany; but in the United States all its veins and arteries are full of health. What a political anomaly! A land consecrated to liberty, and baptized in the blood of freedom, fostering and aiding an ecclesiastical power that has ruined every land where it has ruled! To save America we must kill the Catholic church. Every dogma of Romanism is opposed to every principle of liberty. In fighting the Catholic power we are defending the rights of man.

The British-American Association has from the first raised the cry of warning against the secret hand of destruction that is concealed in the glove of Catholicism; it has steadily worked against this enemy of our schools, of our institutions, of our nation. It has seen the cloud that bodes the coming storm, and has fearlessly pointed out the impending danger. That the people of this nation are too sure of their liberties, is seen by everyone but themselvs. That a determined foe to American institutions is on our soil is apparent to all who are familiar with the history of the Catholic hierarchy.

If this heartless power is defeated, it must be done in one of two ways—by the ballot, or by the bullet. Its deadly hold upon the national throat is felt in every election of the state or nation. It is growing in that direction that givs it power in the government. It is time for our citizens to awake to their duty. What is needed is for every lover of liberty to vote, and to vote with whatever party the Catholic church votes against. The political party that receives the Catholic vote is the friend of tyranny, not of freedom; the instrument of wrong, not of right.

The growth and audacity of the Catholic power in America may well cause alarm in the breast that holds a heart in love with liberty. We must not fail to see the peril to our government. Every Catholic vote is an arm raised against human freedom, human rights, human happiness. It is a priestly weapon directed against public schools, public safety, public honor. A Catholic loves his church; a patriot loves his country, his home, his fireside. We want patriots, not Catholics.

For this reason we rejoice at the movement among our British-American citizens, for in the battle of the ballot they will be found in the army of freemen. It would not be strange if the next political endeavor which givs birth to a new national party in this land should spring from the British Association. Already hav fifty thousand men joined this movement, and within the next four years it is confidently expected that ten times that number will be enrolled under its banner. Such a mighty army will be a force that will not only command the respect of the foes, but it will give confidence and courage to the friends of civil and religious liberty. We extend the right hand of fellowship to the British-American Association. May it urge upon every man who has faith in our republican institutions his duty to become a citizen of the United States, and to defend with his vote our rights, our liberties, our schools, our homes, and our national honor.

THE South Carolinians do not take kindly to the idea of having thousands of Roman Catholic peasants from Europe dumped among them. The press, secular and religious, is strongly against the scheme. One paper says: "We hav some grave difficulties to meet in the South, with the negro as an indolent, thriftless laborer and ignorant, venal voter, but with all these disadvantages we prefer him decidedly to an alien population—alien in religion and in all their ideas of civil government. A Roman Catholic peasantry in our society would be the entering wedge of Catholic domination. That means the autocracy of the pope. It means priestly rule in the family, the school, and the state. It means the confessional, with all its corrupting influences. It means antagonism to everything distinctivly American. It means Jesuitical interference in everything political and religious." This is true enough, but we do not imagin that the priests of Rome would be more bigoted than the Presbyterians who now largely control the South.

ON the gross subterfuge of the church to clear its scripture of the charge of favoring liquor-drinking, Professor Atwater says in the Century: "Another side issue of our temperance discussion is the so-called 'Bible wine' theory, which maintains that the wine used in Palestine in the time of Christ was not alcoholic. I hav been unable to find evidence that the composition of the juice of the grape, the laws of fermentation, or the practice in the making and using of wine were different in that country at that time from those in other countries, or in that country at other times, and believe it safe to say that the theory that Bible wine was different from other wine—that it had not the alcohol which other wines contain—is without any basis to support it in the opinion of the student of science."

A WRITER describes the church of England as consisting of Latitudinarians, Attitudinarians, and Platitudinarians.

Letters from Friends.

MONTAGUE, June 24, 288.

MR. EDITOR: We should be lost without THE TRUTH SEEKER. We do not preserve the copies, but scatter them as much as possible, and all the rest the same. I take ten papers; if the times get much worse I will hav to stop some of them, but not THE TRUTH SEEKER.

GEO. W. CARPENTER.

CANTON, O., July 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER I cannot do without. I tried to get a subscriber, but I liv in a very holy place, therefore I failed to get one. I must hav the truth as long as I liv. Inclosed find $3 25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and R. G. Ingersoll's speech at Reynolds's trial at Boonton, N. J. By all means keep up the pictures. They are grand. They are always the first I look at. D. S. AUNGST.

EUREKA SPRINGS, ARK., June 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I take the liberty to defend Freethought and free speech. I hav had a tilt with several sky-pilots of this city. The bigoted fools get mad; the more enlightened treat me with common civility afterward. I read your excellent paper, and am highly pleased with many articles. Am displeased with those that try to defend the hanging of the Chicago Anarchists. Am highly pleased with the cartoons.

Yours, M. FRENCH.

PONTYPOOL, ONT., June 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I would be lost without your very valuable paper. I would like to send you a couple of subscribers, but the ignorance in this part of Canada is so dense that I cannot find anyone who will think enough to appreciate even Mr. Heston's noble productions. They will hav to learn by dear experience before they come to their senses.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, A. HAUSEL.

SHAKERS, N. Y., July 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am surprised that a gentleman so well informed, generally, as is my friend L. K. Washburn, should hav failed to know that in the catalog of Liberal books there may be found just what he calls for in his "To the Liberal Public," June 23d—a book of hymns and songs for the use of Liberals. If "there is no such book in the market," it is because it is out of print. But long before the lamented Bennett left us, he was instrumental in having issued just such a compilation of hymns, songs, etc., as my friend Washburn demands. I am, Yours, G. A. LOMAS.

PITTSVILLE, WIS., June 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Would you be kind enough to announce in THE TRUTH SEEKER that I will be ready to take the lecture field about September 1st, and should like to receive support sufficient from the Liberals of Wisconsin and Minnesota so that I can work chiefly in these two states for the next year? These states are practically dead to the interests of Freethought, and this being presidential year, and I being a new lecturer, my success for the fall is very uncertain. I would like the Liberals of Wisconsin and Minnesota wishing lectures to address me soon, so my routes can be arranged.

Fraternally yours, GEO. H. DAWES.

BUFFALO, N. Y., July 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav no desire to enter the controversy between Mrs. H. A. Ritchey and Mr. Priestley, as Mr. Priestley has shown that he is fully able to hold his own, but I would like to ask Mrs. Ritchey one question. In her communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 30th, she says she does not believe the heavens and earth were created in six days of twenty-four hours each, and that the Bible does not teach it. Now, if the Bible does not mean six days of twenty-four hours each, why is one day of seven observed by all Christians as a day of rest and worship to commemorate the finishing of the heavens and earth? ALEX. D. BLAIR.

GEORGETOWN, COL., June 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been so interested with the paper I hav scarcely thought of anything else. Indeed, I never will allow that paper to stop coming to me. I never can thank Mr. C. B. Reynolds enough for what I hav learned from him, and the good it has done me. The liberty that he gave me by his lectures here, including his advice to take THE TRUTH SEEKER, is far greater than the liberty granted me when my master was told that I was free. Being free from my master did not free me from the horror of death, but the freedom that Mr. Reynolds has brought to me releases me from all of that. I feel now that when I hav done my duty to man I hav done all that is required of me. If I were a good writer I would try to express my affection for the Liberals wherever found. At any rate, I will say this much—if loving them and doing all I can for them will send me to hell, I am sure to go there. T. S. BUCHANAN.

ROSWELL, N. M., June 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I would be very unhappy if I was compelled to do without the old TRUTH SEEKER. Heston is doing good. Long may he wave.

J. D. Shaw, of Waco, Tex., has been on a lecture tour through our country and has done great good for the cause of Liberalism. He is an effectiv speaker; our people were pleased with him. We hav quite a number of Infidels—as the God-lovers here call us—in Roswell and vicinity. If my opinion is worth anything, they are as good citizens as the professors of Christianity. Mr. Shaw represented himself as being pleased with our country and people. He deserves great credit for taking such a journey as he did. Our town is one hundred and eighty miles from the railroad; to lecture through our country he had to travel two hundred and eighty or three hundred miles by buckboard and stage. He is made of good material, you can depend, or he would never hav undertaken such a trip. Would that there were more Shaws in our ranks, and that they could be heard often in this part of the world. MR. EDITOR: Hoping that you will permit an old subscriber and consistent Freethinker to ventilate a serious grievance which has been brought upon a whole family, I send you the following.

You and your thousands of readers are doubtless acquainted to a greater or less degree with the doings and carryings on of the Salvation Army, the grossest and coarsest religious humbug yet inaugurated in a civilized country and in an enlightened age. But not everyone is aware of all the damnable details of their recruiting devices, "for the sake of Jesus." I will giv you an instance from life—in fact, out of my own family, which has been broken up through the machinations of the unscrupulous men, fishers of "General" Booth's pernicious institution.

We had a daughter, Martha Jane, who had been a dutiful girl and sister in the peaceful family circle till the pestiferous Salvationists set up their traps and snares in Ogden, where they hav done much harm all around, all for the Lord's (Mammon's) sake. She was "converted" on July 17, 1887, greatly to the chagrin and shame of her parents, who objected to her joining that fraud, where lazy bummers of men use credulous and over-confiding women to rob the public under religious guise. But the girl just having become of age, the parental authority ceased, and the toils which she had fallen into closed all the more strongly around her, notwithstanding the most earnest appeals from father, mother, brother, and sisters. Salvation had become instilled in her mind too strongly. She finally became so engrossed in her faith that she left her parental roof, a good home, with plenty of life's comforts, and followed a call from her superiors in the damnable organization to go on an expedition to Bellevue, a rough mining town in Idaho, where she has now been about five months, risking her health, endangering her reputation, and allowing, through her credulity, a black shadow's being cast over all her future. Times and times again has she been earnestly appealed to to giv up that dangerous engagement, which is the very opposit of what a self-respecting young woman should be enmeshed in; but all for nothing. A father's appeals, a mother's prayers, were all in vain. The diabolical fascination of the smooth-tongued gospel-mongers proved too strong, and the result is, a disrupted home, and a dismal future at the very promising threshold of a young career.

The harm has been done in our family, but we send you these statements as a warning for others to beware against the slightest touch of those slimy serpents who hav the love of God on their lips and the disposition of Satan in their black hearts. Inclosed is a likeness of the girl when she was fourteen years old.

Inclosing $3 for renewal of my subscription, and thanking you for your indulgence, I am, in the cause of liberty,

Yours, RICHARD FLINT.

MR. EDITOR: Do not the earnest desire of, the apparent necessity for, and the extreme natural repugnance toward anything else but immortality argue forcibly in its favor? Does not the very loathsomeness of the idea of annihilation imply its impossibility?

To these questions I giv a decided negativ. The inability of the human mind to conceive of or understand annihilation does not prove its impossibility. The mind is incapable of conceiving or understanding anything whatever which does not come to it in the regular way of experience, that is, through the senses. Experience is necessary before knowledge. There is no knowledge attainable except by the efforts of the human mind. Nothing can be appreciated or understood before it has been experienced. There are two kinds of experience—one of actual participation in the act, and another of a mental union or connection with the same event. Thus, to hav the benefit of actual experience, our real presence is required at the scene of action or the accomplishment of the event; this is the experience or appreciation of the senses.

Mental union, or connection with certain events beyond our time or limit, is to witness the scene in the mind of the historian or raconteur—the experience or appreciation of the reason. That which we read, whether of modern or ancient occurrence, can justly be called, in proportion as we are capable of digesting and appreciating it, our own personal experience. Because, when we are capable by complete comprehension of receiving an equal benefit with the beholder of the event, we may justly claim that we too hav learned it from experience. This is gaining experience from the past through the organs of reason.

Anything in accordance with the reason is possible, yes, probable, because based upon at least partial experience; anything not coming within the realms of experience, outside of the domain of the senses, must necessarily not be in accordance with reason, and consequently impossible—to the mind.

Our reason, then, or our mind, whose corner-stone is inheritance and whose foundation is experience, must consider everything outside of its grasp as being impossible and inconceivable. Hence the mind, having experienced only one state of movement or existence, that is, activity, cannot conceive of its opposit condition, that is, rest, inactivity, or annihilation.

Everything in nature, especially the human mind, has a forward movement. Progression is the present state of the known universe. It is only with the greatest effort that man can reverse this process of thought, even for a few minutes, and contemplate with the same sense of appreciation the endless centuries that hav passed as he does those that are to come.

Does this inability to view in the same light destroy their absolute equality, or make the past shorter or the future longer? No. Annihilation, as horrible as it appears to the English eye and as beautiful as it is regarded by the Chinese, will continue as pleasantly in the future as it has done in the past.

Who would not prefer a dreamless sleep to the risk of another life containing the same horrible features as this—that is, birth, poverty, sickness, the lifelong torture of the fear of death? What would be another life without these features, with which nature seems to hav endowed everything—and according to her laws nothing appears to be exempt?

I hope that this answer to the most perplexing and commonest assertion in proof of immortality will find acceptance, as I hav used it with invariable success.

H. W. HAMMOND.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, June 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of June 16th appears an article written by an individual signing himself W. Wellock, arraigning the officials and Secular Union in this city on the grounds of ill-treatment to Dr. York, in which communication such an amount of vindictivness, coupled with utter ignorance, is displayed in regard to all the facts relating to the Liberal movement in Salt Lake City, that it appears necessary to offer some remarks thereon, preliminary to which you will, perhaps, allow us to roughly synopsize his statements, in order to follow us in the necessary explanation.

As a preface to his charges, and by way of exhibiting the exceeding vileness and ingratitude displayed by these officers of the Secular Union toward Dr. York, this ill-advised individual, not having the fear of chronology before his eyes, nor being hampered in the least degree by any regard to correctness of statement, proceeds to narrate how Mr. Samuel P. Putnam visited Salt Lake City "two years ago;" how he organized at that time the "Utah Secular Union;" how he "gushed" over his success in the "columns of your paper;" how he left and returned a year later, and found "nothing done" by the officials elected on his previous visit, did nothing himself, beyond "selling some literature, delivering three lectures, pocketing $50" therefor, and departing, leaving Liberalism in Salt Lake in as bad a condition as he found it.

As a striking contrast to all this do-nothingism on the part of Mr. Putnam and the officials elected under his administration, Mr. Wellock goes on to picture how Dr. York appeared upon the scene and speedily changed this state of things; how he filled the Opera House for fourteen evenings, and, in the picturesque language of Mr. Wellock, "rattled the dry bones of orthodoxy and made the sky-pilots squeal;" how, in fact, everything would hav gone on satisfactorily and eminently harmoniously for all parties, had not the officers of the Union discovered that the aforesaid Dr. York was by far too bold and outspoken a Freethinker to suit their purpose, and how in consequence they felt themselvs impelled to call a "star chamber" meeting, to which Dr. York was invited; at which meeting, with astonishing frankness, they informed him that he "must stop speaking the truth!" He was doing good, they knew, but they "had a living to make," and wanted to be on good terms with every kind of churchmen, except the Mormons, whom—for some purpose unexplained by Mr. Wellock—they preferred to take in a "fricasseed" form.

Mr. Wellock next goes on to explain how, finding that Dr. York could not be turned from his purpose by the aforesaid inducements, "they got up a protest against him," which, with astonishing imbecility, as it would appear to most people, they circulated amongst orthodox churchmen for signatures. But finding that the unterrified doctor "could not be turned from the straight path of manhood and honor," even by the discharge of clerical signatures over his head, they (says Wellock) "gave up the Opera House previous to his last lecture, took away the piano, and discharged Dr. York's solo singer," and probably would hav partaken of Dr. York himself in a fricasseed form, had not his friends "come to the rescue, paid the rent, put back the piano, got up a fine social, presented the doctor with a gold-headed cane and a floral gift," and sent him off triumphant, "independent of the petrified fossils at the head of the Secular Union."

The above is a brief resumé of Mr. Wellock's wondrous jumble of facts and fiction. A more easily punctured bubble never floated.

To begin with, Mr. Samuel Putnam did not on the occasion of a visit to this city two years ago organize the Secular Union, and after a year's absence return to discover that its officials had "done nothing," for the simple reason that that gentleman—who, by the by, did a great deal of good here, and paved the way for much of Dr. York's apparent success—did not organize the Secular Union until his last visit, and consequently, although a tolerably quick man in his movements, has had no opportunity up to the present time to discover by personal observation what the Secular Union officers hav done.

In the second place, the officers of the Union did not organize a "star chamber," nor, indeed, any other kind of a chamber; nor did they get up a "petition" against Dr. York and circulate it either among orthodox or unorthodox churchmen to sign. They did nothing of the kind; and what little they did do bearing the remotest resemblance thereto occurred in precisely a reverse order.

They cordially welcomed Dr. York, and started in prepared to stand by him in a fearless exposition of unemasculated Freethought. On his part they simply looked for solid argument, combined with refinement of language and bearing, and courtesy to every class of his auditors whom they summoned by their advertisments to hear him.

For a time, in some respects, they were not disappointed. Dr. York gave some excellent lectures. His peculiar mannerisms were not entirely suppressed, but they were kept within reasonable bounds. His audiences increased, however, and, emboldened by this indication of success, he became less careful, and added to his legitimate accompaniments of fun and humor, not only considerable of mimicry and low comedy, but something of sheer grimace, at the same time interlarding otherwise excellent arguments against theological absurdities with much coarse denunciation and abuse.

For instance, the Methodist church in this city was referred to as the "Methodist shebang." Presbyterians—and there were many who attended at first—were derided as a blue-nosed class. Semi-Liberalized Mormons, of whom his audiences were frequently largely composed, and who were slowly feeling their way to a closer acquaintance with Liberal ideas, were repelled by denunciations of what he termed "their devilish religion."

Now, as we understood the case, Dr. York was lecturing under the auspices of a Liberal Society, for the prosperity of which we were not only anxious, but indirectly responsible. And, whether he could be made to understand the principle or not, committees arranging with lecturers are responsible to a considerable extent for the character of lectures presented by them to the public, and consequently entitled to consider for themselvs whether as a committee they may be compromised, or the cause they represent injured or impeded in any manner.

This committee, at any rate, so considered; and while they remain in office intend to govern themselvs accordingly.

They were quite convinced that the doctor was doing some good; that, in fact, as they stated to him in the identical "petition" complained of by Mr. Wellock, his arrival in Salt Lake City was "most opportune." But they saw in that fact only the more reason why he should act wisely. They perceived that numerically his audiences were improving, and that so far was encouraging; but they also perceived with regret that quite a number of the solid and intellectual men of the city, the class that alone go to build up permanent Freethought societies, were being repelled after a few attendances, and they simply considered whether it was not possible in a kindly way to induce Dr. York to put a check on some of his exuberances of speech and action.

A remonstrance or appeal to him on this subject was therefore resolved upon, which, after much trimming and pruning, so as to eliminate from it everything of an offensiv character, was forwarded to him. This communication is word for word the same as published in your paper, save and except that the words "Vice-president A. S. U." (American Secular Union) were not appended to the signature of Mr. Mason. The addition of these words and letters to his name was a forgery, performed by Mr. Wellock, and he alone is responsible for that much flourish and affected importance.

The appeal in question was intended at first to be of a strictly private and confidential character as between themselvs and Dr. York; but the committee believing that the addition of the names of a few supporters of the Secular Union would reinforce their sentiments, and tend to show him that they were not alone in their views, a few of such names were added—and they were but few. You hav them all in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It should be stated, however, in this connection that a much larger number of signatures could easily hav been obtained. A great many persons had expressed their objections to the peculiar characteristics of Dr. York's lectures in question. Furthermore, it should be stated that not a single person to whom the document was presented refused to sign it, save in the case of two persons, who expressed their thorough sympathy with the object of the remonstrance, but preferred to state their objection personally to Dr. York.

The signatures appended to the remonstrance, and falsely described by Mr. Wellock as those of "orthodox churchmen," are the names of as ardent Freethinkers as can be found in the country. Several of them were never churchmen in their lives, and the rest only such a good number of years ago, as was Dr. York, for that matter.

Now, we are not millionaires, nor are we troubled with any remarkable surplus of ready cash, but we will undertake as a committee to pay Mr. Wellock the sum of $10 per head for the names of any orthodox churchmen that he can produce from his own published list. The lie in this particular case can be easily nailed. Every one of the individuals referred to by Mr. Wellock resides in this city, and can be reached through the post, and we will undertake to furnish the exact post-office address of any of them to any person desirous of testing the question.

Stupid and blundering as Wellock's wild assertions will be seen to be, it will, we imagin, be readily seen that he has blundered still more in forwarding to your paper a copy of our remonstrance, which we are obliged to you for publishing, and not unobliged to Mr. Wellock for his lack of foresight in sending. It will speak for itself; and we invite your readers to re-peruse it, and note the evidence which it presents of a desire to be fair to Dr. York, the generous admissions which it makes in his favor, and the general moderation of its tone. It expressed at the time, as it expresses now, our views in regard to the general policy most advisable to be followed in connection with the presentation of Liberal ideas—views which, moreover, we believe to be those entertained by thousands of the boldest Freethinkers of our time.

The remonstrance in question was forwarded to Dr. York by the hand of one of his special friends.

His own statement is that he never read it. He nevertheless felt it to be no less incumbent upon him to be just as angry as though he had not only read but thoroughly digested it. From that time on he made a constant practice of publicly assailing the officers of the Union in an indirect way with innuendoes and side-thrusts, asserting, for instance, in a mysterious manner to his audience that "no man could throttle him," etc., much to the bewilderment of those from whom all knowledge of our objections to his course had been carefully withheld.

In regard to the "star chamber" meeting, concerning which the verdant Wellock knows so much, no meeting of the kind described ever occurred. A meeting arising out of, and, of course, following the production of the remonstrance, and to which Dr. York was invited, did occur. But—mark the difference between the fact and Wellock's statement!—it was called solely for the purpose of extending the oliv-branch to Dr. York, or in failure of so doing successfully, of ending the difficulty in some other way. A preamble or preface to the business of the meeting—and which exhibits fully its spirit—was presented, in effect as follows:

That, nnderstanding Dr. York felt himself aggrieved by the action of the executiv committee in forwarding to him a certain remonstrance in regard to his course as the lecturer of our society, and believing that he was misinformed as to its real nature and intent, this meeting is called for the purpose of explaining to him its true spirit and purpose.

As already stated, Dr. York did attend this meeting, and the kindly words of the above preamble were read in his presence. They were, however, scarcely uttered before he rose to his feet, and placing his hat upon his head, as intimating his intention to depart forthwith, stated to the committee and friends present that he did not intend to allow them to explain one word to him in reference to "that paper"—meaning the remonstrance.

He had not read it—did not intend to read it—nor should anyone with his consent refer to its contents in his presence. After considerable effort to induce him to change his mind on the subject, he finally departed, having frustrated every effort to carry out the reconciliatory purpose of the meeting.

In this way terminated Wellock's imaginary "star chamber" meeting, which turns out, as your readers will perceive, to be simply a meeting called for the promotion of a better state of feeling between the executiv committee and their lecturer, and the consequent better utilization of his labors during the remainder of his engagement.

A properly conducted "star chamber," as everybody knows, should hav executed its victim first and interviewed him afterward. It should also, to hav been truly orthodox, hav conducted its session with closed doors. But so lost was this "star chamber" to all proper sense of its obligations to itself in this respect, that it threw open its doors to the friends of the "victim," and descended to the less dignified but more fraternal level of a mere parlor gathering, and which might hav been a very pleasant one had "Barkis" only been "willing."

Your readers, Mr. Editor, we trust are now conversant with the methods by which this committee undertook—in the bombastic language of Mr. Wellock—to turn Dr. York "from the straight [notice "straight"] path of manhood and honor." The exact amount and nature of the manhood and honor of which efforts were made to divest him, will now, we trust, be clear to the minds of your readers. Alas for our efforts, as you will hav discovered, Mr. Editor, virtue triumphed and the wicked were demoralized. Dr. York returned to his platform only to continue in a more indirect way his attacks upon the committee.

Now a few words in regard to Wellock's further charges.

He tells your readers that the Opera House was given up previous to Dr. York's last lecture, implying that, contrary to our engagements, Dr. York was left without a hall to speak in previous to the expiration of his agreed course. Nothing of this was done. The Opera House was retained and its expenses fully paid for every night for which he was engaged. Let us refer your readers, and particularly those residing in this city, to evidences of this fact, which many of them will remember.

After the delivery of Dr. York's first two lectures—just prior to his course of twelve, and just previous to his departure for California—a financial meeting was held to ascertain whether sufficient funds could be raised to insure his services for twelve additional lectures; subscription papers were opened on this occasion for the names of donators, and Dr. York not only agreed at this meeting, in the presence of many witnesses, for the exact number of twelve additional lectures, but he suggested himself to the meeting that the written heading at the top of the subscription papers should state that the sums promised were for the term of fourteen, for the purpose, as he remarked, of including the expenses of the two lectures already delivered, the rent for which occasions was not then paid.

Furthermore, on the occasion of the delivery of the sixth lecture of the additional twelve, Dr. York made a speech in the Opera House, in which, in the presence of several hundred persons, he reminded them of the fact that the lecture of that evening constituted the sixth, and the exact half of the course, and he took particular pains to impress on them the fact that the remaining "six lectures" would be better than the first. For every one of those remaining six lectures, then stated by him to be due (as, of course, for the whole of the eight preceding ones), the expenses were paid, and for it we hav receipts.

The further statement in the same article that we took away Dr. York's piano and discharged his solo singer, is equally misleading. The facts are, that the furnishing of a piano or singer of any kind—much less a solo singer—formed no part of our contract with Dr. York. The creation of a choir, together with the effort to provide and pay for a musical accompaniment, was an unsolicited and purely voluntary act on the part of the executiv committee. Long before the conclusion of the course, Dr. York discourteously expressed his indifference to these efforts of the committee to enhance the interest of the meetings; rudely requested on one occasion that a certain performance by the choir be "cut short," "as the people came to hear the lectures, not the singing."

The piano, voluntarily provided by the committee as stated, was reluctantly relinquished two evenings before the conclusion of the course, simply because the funds in hand were found inadequate to meet the remaining expenses. Dr. York's solo singer—a personal venture of his own—was not discharged by us, as stated by Wellock, only to the extent that she was discharged by the absence of the piano, without the aid of which she professed to be unable to sing.

The personal treatment of Dr. York by the committee should be understood in this connection. They undertook to raise among themselvs and otherwise collect the full amount necessary for the use of the Opera House, and also for the payment of all his advertisments, turning over to him for his own personal use the whole receipts at the door. In this way they personally raised and attended to the expenditure, on account of his course, of a sum amounting to about $400, every cent of which he would otherwise hav had to pay out of his own pocket.

By this generous arrangement—to use Mr. Wellock's choice phrase—he not only "pocketed" $50 for three lectures, as he charged Mr. Putnam with having done, but he "pocketed" from $50 to $70 per night for every evening of the whole of his last course.

While thus fairly treated by the committee, the question next in order is, How did Dr. York treat this body, who undertook and executed these responsibilities on his account?

The answer can be given in a few words. No sooner were the subscription lists, headed by themselvs, well started, with every indication that the necessary amounts would be forthcoming, than he acted as though he had no further use for them. He was engaged to lecture under the auspices of the Secular Union, of which they were in this city the representativs, but, save and except in the case of the president of the Union, who was absent nearly the whole of Dr. York's engagements, he ignored them almost from the beginning, selecting any person he pleased to preside over the meetings, without any regard to the order of the organization constituted before his arrival.

Wellock's winding-up statements as to the "coming of Dr. York's friends to the front," urged by a desire, as he represents it, to rescue this poor man, deprived of hall, piano, and solo singer, and giv him a grand ovation as a testimonial of their independence of the executiv committee, is just as reliable as all of his preceding assertions.

A meeting, with all the accompaniments of flowers, gold-headed cane, and a request for his return, it is true, did take place; but it was engineered by Dr. York himself, who dictated the order of the whole of the proceedings, including the request for his return, and mainly carried into execution by two characterless individuals, previously altogether unknown to Utah Liberalism—one of these a person, and residing in this city under an assumed name, who, it is admitted by Dr. York's friends, illustrated his personal peculiarities upon Dr. York to the extent of $33; the other individual, very well known to Mr. Wellock as one who left a wife and several children in a distant city, and who while yet undivorced was living in unmarried relations with the former wife of a poor paralyzed, deserted, and heart-broken man, whom he further insults by his daily presence under the same roof. With the character of both these worthies we hav good reason to know that Dr. York was made well acquainted previous to the bestowal on them of his patronage.

The ovation in question was no indignation meeting on the part of the Liberals of Salt Lake as against the officers of the Secular Union, as implied by the veracious Wellock. Nine-tenths of those attending had no knowledge of any difficulty existing between the committee and Dr. York; and it was generally supposed that the whole affair was got up under their direction; indeed, they were personally applied to for contributions thereto.

In reference to Mr. Wellock's attempted slur on the character of W. S. Godbe, the president of the Utah Secular Union, a man whom we will venture to assert was never either a "defunct" or a living "prophet, seer, and revelator," to our own knowledge, and with whom, upon the wife question, we should take great pleasure in comparing the record of Mr. Wellock himself:

This gentleman is known to the limit of a circle extending far beyond Utah itself as one of the distinguished "self-made men of America"—one who has done more than any other man to develop and aid the industrial development of this territory.

This gentleman was elected without his knowledge to the office of president of the Union as a small tribute of respect to him as one whose money erected the first free platform in the territory, and who has in addition thereto spent tens of thousands of dollars in aiding the extension of Freethought principles.

Wellock's further implied charge that "all the rest of the officials of the Union are in the category" of former polygamists, and in addition thereto are all Spiritualists, exhibits the reckless character of the man.

No one of them ever was a polygamist, and the two or three only that are Spiritualists were chosen as officials of the Union simply because of their well-known working qualities.

It is true of them, however, as of the other officials of the Union, that they are destitute of the advantages arising from having graduated as "sand-lotters" with Dennis Kearney. Insufficient for the right performance of their duties as this deprivation proves them to be to the minds of such men as Mr. Wellock, they nevertheless "keep the company of their self-respect," and are satisfied with the prospects of the Salt Lake Secular Union, which is receiving as much support from the great body of the Liberals here as they ever anticipated.

OFFICERS OF THE SALT LAKE SECULAR UNION.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Kitten of the Regiment.

This kitten, sir, of the colonel's? I'll tell the story.
We were at Roanoke, a month ago,
Waiting the fleet, and camped the hillside white.
One night, when sentinels were all at post,
We lay around the fires and talked of home.
The smoke wreathed up into the still blue sky,
The wind was whist, and all the stars shone clear—
Just such a night as sleeps above the hills
Of old New England when the frosts are hoar—
Talking not loud, but soft, as soldiers talk
After some months o' the rolling drum and sight
Of blood. The sentinel's sudden challenge came:
"Halt! Who goes there?"

We all leaped up and harked.
"Only Doll Brewster, sir; I've brought my kitty."
What! a child's voice?—a child at bayonet's point?
Shame! Let her pass

Led gently by two brave, kind soldier-boys,
Blushing, with downcast eyes, and pretty lip
Half curled to cry, hair loose and all like gold,
A kitten on her breast, walked sweet Doll Brewster.

Well, sir, the regiment came on the run;
And such a wall of 'em, all of 'em looking down
At a ten-year girl, hair loose, lip curled to cry,
And a kitten, white as snow, curled under her chin.
"Just like my sister!" cried one, "And mine!" cried another,
Till the fire began to look dim to all of us.
Then, sir, the colonel came, with his sword a-clanking.
"What's this?" he cried, but stopped, and his face grew soft.
"Please, sir," said Doll, "I've brought you my little kitty.
It's all I had, and papa is sick and poor.
(Mamma, you know, is dead.) We're Northerners, sir,
And brother died for the flag. I loved him so!
Please take my kitty; I want to giv something, sir."

The colonel? He stooped and caught her in his arms—
Caught kitten and Doll, and kissed 'em both. He did!
And every man of us would hav done the same,
And mighty glad of the chance.

There wasn't an eye
Could hold its tears, nor cheek that had kept dry,
And if it hadn't been for the colonel there,
A hundred of us would hav kissed the child.

That's all the story of the kitten, sir—
The colonel's kitten and the regiment's.
We wouldn't hav a hair of it hurt for gold—
Nor blood, if it came to that!

Hav you a sister?
You know how a man can feel for a bit of a child
With golden hair and eyes like the heaven's blue;
And she'd a brother who died for the old flag, too!

Oh, sir, we dreamed of home the livelong night—
Sisters and sweethearts, mothers and wives and daughters;
Never was sweeter sleep in a soldier's camp.
And all because that little bright-haired child,
Doll Brewster, with a kitten on her breast,
Came up the hill, marched by the sentinel's gun,
Stood in the firelight with her golden hair
All loose, and pretty lip half curled to cry,
And said: "It is all I had. Please take it, sir—
Please take my little kitty; I want to giv something."

Several Valuable Hints.

The following hints—they are nothing more—I offer to those who desire to cultivate the art of composition. Not that the best instruction in the world will of itself make an author or a musician, any more than it can a painter or a sculptor.

Something more than mere teaching is needed. When Opie, the painter, was asked by a young student what he was in the habit of mixing his colors with, he replied, grimly, "With brains, sir." And he was right.

Here we hav the first requisit for success in all arts. Those who hav no will and no "brains" had better exercise some other organ. But even those who hav a fair share of power must know how to use it so as to derive some benefit therefrom. They want practice and they want training, and the training which they cannot attain from others they must be willing to giv to themselvs.

Those, however, who are in earnest about making the most of their power are usually glad to avail themselvs of the experience of others, and for this reason the following lines will be more interesting. It is impossible, in one sense, to teach composition, but it is possible to point out certain errors that should be avoided, and certain objects that should always be kept in view, with the best method of attaining those objects.

And since all the suggestions that I hav to offer with regard to these points are founded upon experience, it is hoped that they will afford help to those who may be trying to help themselvs. I shall begin, then, to express my thoughts in writing, and therefore I must first hav thoughts to express. First the thought, then its utterance; first the matter, and then the manner—these are the two divisions. First, the thought. It is strange that we should require to learn to think, but, like many other strange things, it is true; and anything that helps us to think wisely and truly is not to be neglected. We find that there is no greater stimulus to thought than contact with books, and with other minds through genuin conversation. It is true that real conversation is but seldom to be had. Yet now and then, in the course of our lives, we are so happy as to meet with a companion who has this power of conversation as apart from idle, fragmentary gossiping. And the result is startling. Some change has passed upon us. Not only hav we found a friend, but we hav found ourselvs. We find the same change in ourselvs when we read good books. We do not read them for amusement merely, but in order to store the memory with facts, and to enrich the mind with thoughts of great men. We read and value them for these reasons, but they hav a higher use still, namely, the education of powers, the cultivation of the mind, and the formation of character. "Books," says Emerson, "are for nothing but to inspire."

The food of the mind, like that of the body, is intended to be digested and assimi lated, to nourish and effect growth and increase of power. It is of less importance to read much than to read wisely and well. Wisely—that is, to read exclusivly good authors.

If I am to be in no way wiser when I lay down my Shakspere or Byron than I was when I took it up, I will not read at all. But if I hav held intercourse with a soul that made my soul wiser, then indeed my time has not been wasted. It is the same with reference to writing as it is with reading. For instance, we find ourselvs sitting with pen in hand, prepared to begin to write; at this point we are confronted with an important question as to what can be said that is worth saying on the subject.

I now come to the second point—the utterance of the thought. We may know what it is that we wish to say; we hav next to consider how we will say it. For an instant it is impossible to express our thoughts without much difficulty. We are resolved, then, to be accurate.

The next point to consider is clearness. We may write our composition after we are able to express our thoughts, but whether it is clear and true in regard to meaning remains to be determined. The simplest words will serve us the best, for we are writing in order to be understood by others, and unless we can attain this primary object our labor will be thrown away. If we wrap up our meaning in many words we will conceal it; our object, remember, is to lay it plain to the public.

We find it is a good plan to read over our writing when we hav completed it, and to strike out every unnecessary word. Avoid redundant adjectivs, like some people who pour forth a whole torrent of words with no discoverable object or meaning. Above all, we should spare no pains, for the honest old maxim says, "No excellence without great labor."

But it may be said, Are accuracy and clearness to be our only objects? What becomes, then, of beauty and style? Here, I confess, I can giv no rules. Beauty of style is the result of the special powers of the individual. In this nothing will so much avail you as the study of great authors. Read them from pure love of them. "Bathe your spirit," as Charles Kingsley beautifully expresses it, "in their noble thoughts as in the May-dew, and feel yourself thereby, if but for an hour, more fair." Giv yourselvs up to their influence; drink in the spirit of their writings, and you will feel yourselvs lifted into a purer atmosphere, better able to see and feel truth yourselvs, and better able to make others see and feel it also.

Correspondence.

PITTSBORO, MISS., April 25, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My uncle takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and when I am there I read the little folks' letters. I like the pictures. I am eight years old; hav two brothers and one little sister, who is six. She and I hav learned the multiplication table, and our aunt has given us a nice dress. We are staying with her this week.

I am having the chills. We hav an autograph album, and would like if you would send us a verse. We hav been going to school, but our school is out. We will hav lots of apples this year, and if you will print this I will giv you one when you come.

Your friend, DAISIE WEBSTER.

WEST SUTTON, MASS., July 6, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I told you how we spent the Fourth of July last year, I will tell you how we spent it this year. A flag was suspended across the road from the top of two large maple-trees in front of our house. In the afternoon Willie, my brother, and I invited fourteen of our playmates to enjoy a picnic in our front yard. We read the Declaration of Independence which was published in the Children's Corner last week. We then gave toasts or sentiments as follows: "Our country: may it ever be the land of liberty." "The president: may he be guided by the example of Jefferson, whose great Declaration we read to-day." "THE TRUTH SEEKER: may it liv forever and be a great light to guide all seekers after truth in those paths that are peaceful and joyous." "Miss Wixon, Aunt Susan who makes the Children's Corner: may she be healthy and happy, and liv so long that we can call her grandma." Then we were served with cake, confectionery, and lemonade. We had a jolly time until about 6 o'clock, when we dispersed. I hope the children will write and tell us how they spent the Fourth of July.

Yours respectfully, LUCY W. PHELPS.

[That was a charming way to spend the national holiday. It was rational and sensible, too. When sturdy patriots are wanted in some future day, some will be found in West Sutton, we are sure.—ED. C. C.]

Polliwigs.

Some say "polli*wogs*." But that is incorrect. You know what I mean, don't you? Yes, tadpoles—that is their other name.

When at Florence, Mass., last spring I became quite interested in a family of polliwigs, or tadpoles. During my stay in that lovely village my home was with Mr. and Mrs. D. Ross, who hav three charming children—Alfred, Bertie, and Mabel.

Said Mabel the first evening of my arrival: "Oh, I hav something funny to show you, Miss Wixon, and you cannot think what it is."

Of course, I could not; and when she brought out a fruit-jar, what could I think it contained but—preserves? Well, it was a queer kind of preserves, as you will admit, for the jar contained nothing more, nothing less, than a glairy mass of embryo or baby frogs. She had taken them from a brook near by, and the little creatures were in various stages of development, darting around in the water like little eels.

"Well, well!" I thought; "now here is a study, sure enough," and my mind went out to "protoplasm," "germ cells," and other matters that our scientific friends talk so freely about, and yet know so very little of.

Every jelly-like cell contained a little black dot, which was the new tadpole life. Some had grown into quite activ life, and were shooting about in the water in great style, while others were in different stages of development, for it takes eight periods to develop a full-grown frog. A great many die before reaching maturity, and it is well they do, for otherwise we would be literally overrun with frogs, since each mother frog may produce a thousand children at a time.

You hav heard about its "raining frogs." It never did, of course; but you can readily perceive that the deposit of eggs or cells might be taken up by a high wind, and in favorable temperature literally swarm in certain localities, and that ignorant people might be led to the supposition that they really rained down.

Frogs hav wonderful vitality. You may wound and gash them severely and they will continue to liv, and even after the heart and intestins are removed they will liv quite a while; and because of their great hold on life they are selected to demonstrate lessons in physiology, like muscular contraction, circulation of the blood in the smaller vessels, changes that the blood makes in passing through the lungs, under the action of oxygen, etc.

Is it a fish?

Well, not exactly, although it passes a good part of its time in the water; it can get along quite well on dry land, but it loves the water best.

It is a reptil coming under the batrachian order, or perhaps, more correctly, it may be classed under the name Amphibia. It has gills at first, which, as it grows older, disappear, and it breathes by means of lungs. The big bullfrog has a loud, hoarse voice, and is an excellent diver and swimmer. By watching the frog in the water and imitating him, boys hav learned to become good swimmers.

There is a species called "March peepers," that peep like chickens early in the spring.

Frogs are tailless, and their hind legs are long in proportion to other parts of the body. They are marked prettily in green, yellow, brown, and black, and with their big eyes are really interesting creatures.

There are several varieties among them—the horned frog, a very peculiar-looking creature, tree frog, etc.

Their fossil remains hav been discovered by geologists, showing that they are of remote origin, and in the older periods grew to an immense size, there being accounts of frogs twelve feet long!

In Europe their hind legs are considered a great delicacy, and people esteem them a dainty luxury for the table.

People laugh about the great green frog, but I, for one, feel like paying great respect to him and his family. They are, in my eyes, really pretty as they leap about the marshy bogs with all the grace and poise of a gymnast, destroying insects, worms, and little creatures that are harmful to vegetation.

Little Mabel Ross was quite right in her study of the polliwigs in their various stages of life and growth. No other creature has rendered such great service to mankind in physiology and chemistry as the frog. I think he would, if he could, croak a "That's so" to the statement. But while no living creature is unworthy our notice, the frog demands more than ordinary mention and respect for the truths that hav been shown by means of his body. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What is the correct term for "polliwogs?" What other name are they known by? Describe them. Are frogs very prolific? Name the number that might be hatched at one time. Did it ever rain frogs? What of their tenacity of life? Tell what you can of experiments with frogs. Is the frog fish or reptil? To what order does it belong? Define batrachian, amphibia. How may boys learn to swim? Describe the frog. What of the March peepers?—the horned frog? What of fossil frogs? Are frogs ever eaten for food? Of what use are frogs? What great service hav they rendered humanity?

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Religious Problems

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Evolution.

From all things there is sighing on our earth,
Up-welling from the mystery of woe
That broods upon it, twin-born with its birth.
To last for aye and ever? Nay! With slow
Unfolding of an inwrapped heart of peace,
'Mid sacrificial waste for one great type
Through countless suff'ring ages—yet to cease!
To end in consummation of the ripe
And perfect fruit of all things! Such the creed
That nature chants us in her moods of joy,
And 'neath her frown which we hav learned to read,
Good at the last! Great good without alloy!
Time rolls not gainless on; and primal night
E'en now gives birth to dawn, and hope of perfect light!

Woman.

The point of my remarks about the Secular Union and Woman Suffrage was that it is not included in the list of the Demands; it was put there some years ago, and taken out, for fear it would damage the cause. My knowledge is from the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS. Numerous letters from Liberals hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER owning that woman should hav the ballot by right, but in opposition to it by policy, in fear she would giv away the country to the church. Just such principle as that belongs to those who deny the polls to the negro and to those who hav burnt Infidels. Its name is cowardice. I say again, if the Secularists had done their duty the late suffrage convention could not hav been captured by Christians.

JOHN P. GUILD.

Freethought Books.

There are books for all faiths, as there are dishes for all appetites, and one has often but to read closely the books that are written in advocacy of varying creeds to vacillate from one to the other perpetually, as the pendulum swings from one extreme to the other of its restricted orbit. "The Secret of the East; or, The Origin of the Christian Religion and the Significance of Its Rise and Decline," by Felix L. Oswald, is so well written and has so much of the logic of common sense on its side, that one lays it down at last almost convinced that the votaries of strictly orthodox creeds hav done more harm than good in the world with their severe and loveless religion. When we read that religion has actually devastated the earth with wars, destroyed the prosperity of nations, tortured and slaughtered millions, and interfered in every way with innocent recreations, handing over to the devil the flowers that God intended should bloom for his own elect, if we believe what we read, we are forced to recognize the right of mankind to investigate the claims of such religion before accepting and adopting it. However the judgment of different readers may vary as to the reliability of the author's statements, nobody can deny that he says what he has to say in forcible and vigorous language, and has, at least, the similitude of reason on his side of the question. The book is published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York.—Chicago Evening Journal.

MRS. SLENKER'S BOOKS.

"Little Lessons" just received, and it is a beauty in style and just the thing for juvenils.—SAM. H. PRESTON, New York.

In my opinion, "Little Lessons" contains a great deal of very useful knowledge in an exceedingly attractiv form for children, or even for those too old to be considered children.—G. C. ADAMS, Fort Concho, Tex.

I received "John's Way" all right. It is an excellent story. If all Christians would only read it!—W. B. PAGE, Room 24, Benedict Building, 29 Euclid ave., Cleveland, O.

If all children could hav the benefit of such reading as "Little Lessons," we would hav more thinkers and fewer grown babies.—MRS. LUTE HART, Gilmer, Tex.

"Little Lessons" is a splendid work. If children could all get such reading as that, they would be well entertained and obtain useful information at the same time.—MRS. NORA E. TERRILL, Farmdale, O.

I hav read "John's Way," the "Infidel School-Teacher," and "The Darwins," and like them very much. They contain very noble sentiments, clothed in language which even the most conservativ cannot object to. They are just the books for every Infidel to buy and lend to his or her Christian neighbors.—CHARLES LOWND, Minneapolis, Minn.

You will find "John's Way" full of interest and instruction; also "The Darwins" and the "Infidel School-Teacher;" and "Little Lessons for Little Folks" is just the book for the children—teaching them of nature and her works, Life and her children. We, that is, our better half, the assistant editor, and self, sat down last evening to commence reading "John's Way," and we never stopped until it was finished, so interesting did this Radical romance prove. Yes "John" had "a way of his own," and a good way it proved. Friends, if you want to read one of the most interesting of romances, send for "John's Way." Price, 15 cents.—Echoes from Sunny-Land.

So says Free hought, listen to it:

The pope owns nine-tenths of the Irish people, body and mind. But they are not alone in their mental serfdom. It is an unwelcome and melancholy fact that the minions of Rome are increasing and overwhelming us, but it is true, and they will elect the next president of the United States.

If in place of mental serfdom you read rational obedience to lawful authority; and in place of "the minions of Rome" you put the children of Rome, you hav in the above lines of Freethought a statement to which you and I and others may subscribe. It would not surprise us if Catholics elected the president of the United States, not only next year, but every fourth year, from 1888 to the end of time. At the rate they are increasing in this country, this is a conclusion one may easily arrive at without the least claim to prophetic spirit, or even too much depth of thinking. Nay, this is very much backed up by the experience of 1884; there is not a politician in America who doubts that Cleveland is the present incumbent of the White House by the power of the Catholic vote. Up to the momentous hour of Parson Burchard's speech, thousands of Catholics in New York city, Brooklyn, and New Jersey had decided to vote for Blaine. But there came the famous alliteration of this learned divine: "Rum, Romanism, Rebellion." It was a thunderbolt out of a clear sky, smiting the Republican camp. Catholics indulged in some thinking then—they do it oftener than they are given credit for. The result of their thinking was that a party which could countenance such insult to their church was a party it was best for them to get clear of, and they did. The result was Cleveland's election. And now, ye rulers of earth, great and small of the world, read, ponder, understand—and beware of the Rock!

Catholic Inroads.

From the Observer (Presbyterian).

A master in the English High School of Boston has been rebuked and disciplined by the school board for making an offensiv definition of "indulgences," and the text-book which "misled the teacher" has been condemned and ordered to be removed. This is not astonishing in a city where the government is mainly in the hands of foreigners, and where leading city officials joined in a great public demonstration in honor of a drunken prize-fighter. But this control of the teaching of our common schools, including the exclusion of history and literature until it is adapted to the views of Romanists, is simply outrageous in view of their warfare with the entire system of public instruction. They hav denounced the schools and established their own, and now they want to compel the country to teach history in such a way that its most important lessons may never be learned by the young people of this land.

Memoranda.

There are two labor parties in the United States at present—the Union Labor party and the United Labor party—with names almost as nearly similar as are the politics of the Democratic and Republican parties. This is constantly leading to confusion, misconception, and misstatements in regard to each. Many contemporaries are making the most ridiculous blunders in using the names indiscriminately. For the information of those subject to this habitual confusion of terms, and in the interest of journalistic accuracy, it may be stated that there is no state organization of the United Labor party in Texas. Nor has it any national organization. It was founded in New York city by Henry George and the friends and followers of the George or single land tax theory. The Union Labor party was founded at Cincinnati, February 22, 1887, by representativs from the various states. It has a national organization and state organizations in the majority of the states.—Southwest.

Altogether there are 401 electoral votes. Of these 201 are necessary to secure the presidency. There are eighteen states casting 182 votes that are reasonably safe for the Republicans. There are sixteen states casting 153 votes that are reasonably safe for the Democrats. There are four doubtful states—New York with thirty-six votes, Indiana with fifteen, New Jersey with nine, and Connecticut with six. The Democrats cannot elect their president without carrying New York; the Republicans can. If the Democrats carry Indiana, New Jersey, and Connecticut, and lose New York, they will still lack eighteen of the necessary 201 votes. If the Republicans carry New York and lose the three other doubtful states, they will elect their president with seventeen votes to spare. The Republicans can win by carrying Indiana and New Jersey in addition to the eighteen sure Republican states; they can win by carrying Indiana and Connecticut in addition to them. The Democrats must carry New York and Indiana, or New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey, in order to elect their candidate.—Rochester Post-Express.

Extracts from Voltaire's "Pocket Theology."

CONCORDAT: An agreement come to between a pope and a most Christian king, by which both one and the other dispose of things to which they never had the slightest claim.

BREVIARY: A selection of prayers, in elegant Latin, that the priests, the bestowers of blessings, to gain their salary, are obliged to recite every day, under pain of being useless to society.

FOUNDATIONS: Revenues granted to priests and friars so that they may eat well, drink well, sleep well, and sing well, to the end that the vineyards of those who hav not the time to sing be assured against rain and hail.

CRUSADES: Pious expeditions ordained by the popes to clear Europe of a multitude of villainous bigots, who, to obtain from heaven the remission of the crimes they had committed at home, went valiantly and committed others against their neighbors.

MARRIAGE: A state of imperfection, of which, however, the church has made sacrament. There is but one thing good about it, and that is, that it puts money in the way of the priests, who hav prudently invented hindrances to hav the pleasure of selling dispensations to them.

CREDIBILITY: According to theologians, motivs of credibility are convincing reasons or plain proofs that compel us to believe any given thing. In religion, the motivs that compel us to believe are, the word of our pastor, ignorance, custom, but above all and before all, the fear of getting ourselvs into trouble.

EXAMINATION: It is a great sin for a good Catholic to presume to examin whatever is said by his self-proclaimed infallible clergy. Good Protestants, on the other hand, may examin whatever is said by their clergy, which does not proclaim itself infallible, provided they be of the same way of thinking as the clergy.

BALAAM: A false prophet whose ass, it is said, possessed the gift of speech. Strong-minded people, of course, will not believe this, notwithstanding the fact that this miracle has been perpetuated in the church, where nothing is more ordinary than to see asses, both male and female, speak, and even reason on questions of theology.

REVOLTS: A spirit of pious bickering and opposition sometimes shown by the clergy toward princes and rulers of nations. A Christian may lawfully rebel against his sovereign when the pope counsels such action on his part, or when it is profitable to the clergy; in such cases it is the sovereign who has rebelled against the pope, or against the clergy, in other words, against God himself.

GOD: A word synonymous with priests. To offend God is to offend the priests; to believe in God is to believe all that the priests tell us. When God is said to be wroth, it means that the priests are out of temper. By substituting the word priest for the word God, theology becomes the simplest of sciences. This established, it follows that there can be no true Atheists, seeing that no one but a triple imbecil would attempt to deny the existence of the clergy, which is a very palpable fact.

RELIGION: A system of doctrin and of conduct invented by God himself for the good of the priests and the salvation of our souls. There are many religions on the earth, but the only true religion is that of our forefathers, who were much too wise to allow themselvs to be deceived. All other religions are but absurd superstitions, and should be abolished if possible. The true religion is the one we are accustomed to, or to which it might be dangerous to show any opposition. The religion of our princes, in particular, is marked with the indelible characters of truth.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

YOU may break, you may shatter the "vase" if you will, but the various ways of pronouncing it, according to locality, will cling around it still.

AN individnal whose rest is disturbed by the loud ticking of his timepiece says the next time he buys one it shall be one of the "silent watches of the night."

YOUNG wife (at the window): "Oh, heavens, Bridget! Stand by me!—don't leave the room!" Bridget: "Oh, murdher, mum! what is it—a tramp?" Wife: "Oh, worse! worse! it's the minister!"

IT is said that by holding the breath one can make his skin insensible to the sting of an insect. This remedy never has a trial. When a man is interviewed on a tender point by a wasp, he is bound to shout.

"AND if I should die, dear," said a sick husband, "will you sometimes visit my grave?" "Yes, John," she replied, brokenly, "every pleasant Sunday afternoon, and I will take the children. Poor little things, they don't hav very much to enjoy!"

MINISTER: "Did yon enjoy the Sunday-school picnic, Bobby?" Bobby: "Well, I didn't like the cake." Minister: "Why, yonr mamma makes splendid cake, Bobby?" Bobby: "I know she does. Bnt the loaf she gave me to take was eaten by the snperintendent and the teachers."

"MY pilgrimage has been in vain," he moaned. "I am but twenty-one years of age, and am altogether too young for this town. BEARDED stranger (who ran away to sea when a boy): "Do you remember a boy named Dick Dart?" District telegraph manager: "Very well. Twenty years ago I sent Dick around the corner with a message reqniring an immediate answer." "I am Dick Dart." "Well, giv me the answer."

AN OFFENSIV CAMPAIGN.—Billy: "Tom, ain't you comin' out wid der boys to hav a game of ball?" Tom: "Can't. I's got to go to Sunday-school." Billy: "Oh, there won't be no Sunday-school today. We've been down to the church and tied the teacher hands and legs to the stove!" Tom goes with them.

CHARLIE: "O Jack! yon said a bad word just now." Jack (who has just hit his finger with a hammer): "I don't care if I did. It hurt awfully." Charlie: "But you said a cuss-word." Jack: "Well, grandpa does, often." Charlie: "O Jack! he doesn't, bnt it wouldn't matter if he did, because he is deaf and can't hear himself."

A RADICAL'S VERSION.

Tell me the old, old story
Of unseen things above,
Of golden castles in the air,
Which none may test or prove.
Tell me the story boldly,
As to a little child;
For I am weak and foolish,
And wish to be begniled.

Tell me the old, old story,
That I may be taken in,
With idle tales of glory,
And nostrnm cures for sin.
Tell me the story often,
Lest I grow sane too soon,
Deceived in childhood's morning,
But not in manhood's noon.

Tell me that story always,
If yon would really be
A stumbling-block to progress,
To all that's good and free;
And when sweet truth and reason
Are dawning on my sonl,
Tell me that story promotly,
Lest sense should make me whole.

And of another:

I love the startling story,
Although it is not true,
For it satisfies my longings
As lies alone can do.

Gems of Thought.

THE dungeon-life of the monastic maniacs, and the abject submission to the nuisance of atmospheric impurities, avenged themselvs in the ravages of pulmonary consumption; the votaries of dungeon-smells were taught the value of fresh air by the tortures of an affliction from which only the removal of the cause could deliver a victim, and millions of orthodox citizens died scores of years before the attainment of a life-term which a seemingly inscrutable dispensation of heaven grants to the unbelieving savages of the wilderness. The cheapest of all remedies, fresh air, surrounded them in immeasurable abundance, craving admission and offering them the aid which nature grants even to the lowliest of her creatures, bnt a son of a miracle-working church had no concern with such things, and was enjoined to rely on the efficacy of mystic ceremonies: "If any man is sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.' "And the prayer of faith shall cure the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up."—Prof. Felix L. Oswald's Bible of Nature.

LET me call your attention to what we hav received from the followers of the ghosts. Let me giv you an outline of the sciences as taught by these philosophers of the clouds. All diseases were produced, either as a punishment by the good ghosts, or out of pure malignity by the bad ones. There were, properly speaking, no diseases. The sick were possessed by ghosts. The science of medicin consisted in knowing how to persuade these ghosts to vacate the premises. For thousands of years the diseased were treated with incantations, with hideous noises, with drums and gongs. Everything was done to make the visit of the ghost as unpleasant as possible, and they generally succeeded in making things so disagreeable that if the ghost did not leave the patient did.—Ingersoll.

THE doctrin of the church on this subject was clear and decided. The theater was unequivocally condemned, and all professional actors pronounced to be in a condition of mortal sin. That was the sentence of the church upon those whose lives were spent in adding to the sum of human enjoyments, in scattering the clouds of despondency, and charming away the weariness of a jaded mind. None can tell how many hearts it has wrung with anguish. The man who did more than any other to remove the stigma that rested upon actors, was unquestionably Voltaire. There is, indeed, something singularly noble in the untiring zeal with which he directed poetry and eloquence, the keenest wit and the closest reasoning, to the defense of those who had so long been friendless and despised.—Lecky.

COMEDIANS: Persons who pursue an abominable calling, and who, for good reasons, are highly displeasing in the sight of the ministers of the Lord. They are proscribed and excommunicated in France, where priests profess, by divine right, the exclusiv privilege of acting plays.—Voltaire.

THE church has always regarded the stage as a rival, and all its utterances hav been as malicious as untrue. It has always felt that the money given to the stage was in some way taken from the pulpit. It is on this principle that the pulpit wishes everything, except the church, shut up on Sunday. It knows that it cannot stand free and open competition. All well-educated ministers know that the Bible suffers by a comparison with Shakspere.—Ingersoll.

SAR.: 'Tis true I hav not shed
Blood as I might hav done, in oceans, till
My name became the synonym of death—
A terror and a trophy. But for this
I feel no penitence; my life is love:
If I must shed blood, it shall be by force.
Till now, no drop from an Assyrian vein
Has flowed for me, nor hath the smallest coin
Of Nineveh's vast treasures e'er been lavished
On objects which could cost her sons a tear.
If then they hate me, 'tis because I hate not;
If they rebel, 'tis because I oppress not.
O men! —Byron.

LET us conceive the object of the Positivist's adoration. Let us consider what claims to godhood may be made for humanity. When, among a people professing that religion of peace preached to them generation after generation by tens of thousands of priests, an assembly receives with enthusiasm, as lately at the Gambetta dinner, the toast, "The French army, the highest embodiment of the French nation," when, along with nominal acceptance of forgivness as a Christian duty, there goes intense determination to retaliate, we are obliged to reprobate either the feeling which they actually think proper, or the hypocrisy with which they profess that the opposit feeling is proper.—Herbert Spencer.

THE ASS IN THE LION'S SKIN.—A HINT TO TALMAGE, BRADEN, ET AL.

An ass having put on a lion's skin, roamed about frightening all the silly animals he met, and seeing a fox, he tried to alarm him also. But Reynard, having heard his voice, said, "Pooh! Notes and Clippings.

ELDER SLOCUM, of Beach Pond, R. I., is a religious fanatic who has so cruelly starved and abused his stock that he had to be arrested.

SERVICES at the Boston First Baptist church were enlivened recently by the chasing from the church of Pastor Allen by Brothers Collier and Hardwick with raised fists.

M. MERCIER, premier of the province of Quebec, has been decorated by Pope Leo with the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Gregory the Great, to recompense him for "services he has rendered the state."

MAYOR ROCHE, of Chicago, was called upon a few days ago by a committee appointed to criticise the non-enforcement of the Sunday law, but refused to listen to them, as they were non-residents, and finally showed them the door.

THE nominees of the Equal Rights (woman suffrage) party are Belva Lockwood and Alfred H. Love; of the United Labor party, Cowdry, of Illinois, and Wakefield, and of the Union Labor party, Alson J. Streeter, of Illinois, and Charles E. Cunningham, of Arkansas.

DANIEL SCHOBERT, of New York, having long been crazy on religion, has at length made his whole family so, and they hav been arrested. "This little girl can giv you any excerpt from the New or the Old Testament," said Mrs. Schobert, as she sat with her five-year-old child in her lap at the office of the charities commissioners. "She has been brought up in the fear of God."

A ROMAN CATHOLIC school-girl of Brooklyn, named Carty, has complained to the board of education that her teacher "humiliated her and other Roman Catholic scholars" by teaching a few plain historical truths about the Reformation.

THE heirs of recently deceased wealthy residents of Three Rivers diocese, Canada, hav raised such an outcry against Jesuits for influencing deathbed bequests in favor of themselvs, that the bishop has had to pretend to order the Jesuits from the diocese.

I OPENLY and solemnly charge that, as an institution, the church is simply organized pharisaism and hypocrisy, that she is the enemy of thought, and that she is the friend of every vested wrong and a stumbling-block in the way of every great reform.—Pentecost.

JUST as the pastor of the Laurel Fork church, Whitely county, Tenn., had read his text the other Sunday, a volley of firearms was heard at the door, and an affray ensued in which several were killed. It is supposed that a long succession of preaching from the bloody Old Testament texts had brought the feelings of the men to a crisis that a final bit of ferocity served to explode.

THE Pan-Presbyterian Council was anxious to find some solution of the embarrassment arising from the preaching to the heathen of so many assorted varieties of the one true religion. They complained that the Baptists, for instance, preach that the infant baptism of the Presbyterians is a pagan abomination. The Episcopalians deny to both the title of church, and affirm that they are sects cut off by man's perverseness from the true church established by Christ.

CHARLES K. WHIPPLE in Truth tells of a boy who replied to the Sunday-school teacher's statement that "Jesus took no revenge, not even upon those who betrayed and crucified him:" "He didn't then, but he is going to."

OF Harrison, the Rev. M. L. Haines, pastor of that candidate's church at Indianapolis, writes: "'Our responsibility to God' is a phrase I hav heard him use a number of times in his prayers, and in such a tone as to make it clear that it is one of the great truths that shape his thinking and conduct."

THE pope in his late encyclical on Liberty says: "Human liberty, in individuals as in societies or governments, implies the necessity of conforming to a supreme rational law which emanates from God. The church is not an enemy of honest, legitimate liberty, but is an enemy of license. It condemns false liberalism or naturalism, which declares that there is no supreme law and that everyone must form his own faith and religion. Such doctrin tends to destroy the consciousness of the difference between good and evil."

THE Wales farmers continue their stubborn refusal of tithes for the Established church. The military hav been sent to protect and assist the tithe collectors, but the people refuse to sell either the soldiers or the police any supplies, furnish them any conveyance, or hold any intercourse whatever with them. The situation has been growing quite serious, the government seemingly becoming more determined and the Welsh people more desperately in earnest. It will no doubt end in the disestablishment of the church in Wales and the abolishing of tithes.

JOHN CARSWELL, a deacon of the Scotch National church at Bloomsbury, England, was recently fined $5 in a police court for assaulting the wife of Johnson, a village painter, in the church. The evidence was that he struck her with the pedestal of the offertory box so that she became ill and had to leave the church. The assault was a part of a row between the church officials and the pastor, the Rev. J. Mackie.

HERE'S a neat and, the Sun thinks, probably true story of a small Boston boy, who was just learning to say his evening prayer. The other night he began with his usual drawl: "Now—I—lay—me——" and then waited for his mother to help him. "Go on, Harold," she said. "Now—I—lay—me——" "Down," prompted the mother. "Down came a blackbird and nipped off her nose Amen," said Master Harold with great alacrity and fluency, and jumped up and popped into his little bed.

THE Chinamen of New York recently held a big Chinese picnic and excursion, and gave notice of the exclusion from the festivities of all "Sunday-school Chinamen," that is, Christianized Chinamen. No wonder. Probably they hav been reading up the little peculiarities of Christendom to advantage. Perhaps they hav already observed in their whilom brothers an inexplicable desire to tie them up and deprive them with pincers of sundry necessary portions of their anatomy—eyes, ears, tongues, legs, etc.; or their objections may be directed against nothing more serious than little liabilities of getting accused of every known crime, having it said that their grandmothers were horse-thieves, and being arrested and fined for blasphemy.

Was Jesus Insane?

The gospels contain a great many meaningless expressions which Jesus used, that go to prove that he was not "right in his mind." At one time, when he was sitting with the multitude, it was told him that his mother and brethren wished to see him. Did he act like a sane person, like a son, like a brother? No! He acted like a lunatic, and cried out: "Who is my mother or my brethren? And he looked round about him and said, Behold my mother and my brethren."

In John's gospel is contained another instance which reflects upon the mental soundness of Jesus. It is at the marriage in Cana. His mother is present. The guests had drunk up all the wine and the mother of Jesus went to him and said, "They have no wine." He turns upon her and says, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" Men with any love in their hearts do not speak to their mothers like this. Is this the way for a God to speak? Is such an address the evidence of divinity or of insanity?

In the eighth chapter of John's gospel we find the most astounding claim made by Jesus. He is talking with some Jews and said to them: "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad.

"Then the Jews said unto him, Thou art not fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham?

"Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am." Imagine a man making the statement that he had been living for fifteen hundred years!

The only other person, we believe, who could boast of having lived so many centuries was that remarkable character that Rider Haggard has given the world, called "She."

If there were only this one speech in the gospels upon which to fix the charge of insanity upon Jesus, it were enough. In our time a man making such a foolish statement could be sent to the insane asylum. His heirs would require no other evidence to convict him of unsound mind, and would ask the court to place him under the care of a guardian. Wills have been broken with less evidence of the testator's lunacy. This foolish speech of Jesus ought to cost the Christian world all respect for the speaker's intelligence. How much value can we place upon the discourse of a man who declares that he existed before a person who had been dead fifteen hundred years?

The story relates that after Jesus made this astonishing announcement of his antiquity he hid himself. I don't wonder.

We find that Jesus often referred to his second coming, and promised his followers that when he came he would reward them. At one time he is reported as having said: "The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works.

"Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom."

He said to the high priest: "Hereafter shall ye see this Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." There is no mention anywhere that Jesus ever came in the clouds of heaven, with or without his angels, or that he rewarded his followers "according to their works."

All such talk was merely the irresponsible utterances of an unbalanced mind. The world does not put confidence in the words of Jesus. No one to-day imagines that this person came in the clouds, or that he will ever come in that fashion.

But there is one feature of this man's character which has been passed in charitable silence or mentioned with seeming disguise of its terrible significance. This man tells us that he is "meek and lowly in heart." In the light of his subsequent career these words are but the smile worn on the face of hate. We must not forget that there is "method in madness." This man's mind was filled with the idea that he was a divine person, called to rule the world. Anyone who disputed his right to the throne was his enemy; anyone who stood in the path of his ambition was to be removed. Any means, no matter how cruel, that would hasten the fulfilment of his designs, were sacred. Now let us see the spirit that animated Jesus, this man who was "meek and lowly in heart," this very humble person.

Here is what he says, "But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay before me" (Luke xix, 27).

This man's fierce ambition would see all those who disputed his right to rule slain before his eyes. Never was human heart inspired with blacker passion than this. Never did cruelty exceed this command.

Are men serious who ask us to believe that Jesus was divine, that the fires of love, of mercy, of charity warmed his heart, and that only the great-hearted longing to help the world fed his brain with thoughts and filled his hand with power? Are men serious who tell us that in this person's career can be seen the footsteps of a God, that in this person's language is the music which angels delight to hear, and that his deeds are the high examples of mighty virtue that would rob its own life of joy to give joy to mankind? No! these men cannot be serious, or they know not the import of their words. We cannot be true to our sense of right, to our feelings, to our heart's best throbbings, and read the story of Jesus with satisfaction. The world must give up the foolish faith that the gospels of the New Testament contain the history of a divine existence, that these books are a library of divine wisdom, and that the record contained on their pages is the biography of a Son of God. Our intellects must stoop to accept such a faith. To believe this, we must write Imbecile on the brow, tell truth to wear the mask of hypocrisy, bid honesty put out its sight, lend to the grave the shining virtues of our race and drape our manhood in black. Why, the very majesty of nature must crawl in the dust and the lips of truth kiss the feet of falsehood.

I have read the words of Jesus to see in them the inspiration of a lofty mind, but I must candidly declare that his words seem to me to mirror the moods of a shattered brain. I have followed his wanderings to find the evidence of a noble desire to improve his race, but I must frankly say that his every step seemed to be taken on the ladder of a selfish ambition. The throne he sought turned to a cross. He was crowned by the empty hand of death. The wild dream ended in a terrible reality. Instead of the world at his feet in homage, he saw only his executioners from his dying post. Not a follower in sight; not an angel came to his relief; no hand reached down from heaven to smite his enemies.

His death is a witness to his insanity. He had trusted in a delusion, and he died disappointed.

It is claimed by some that Jesus asserted his divine claims as the Christ or Messiah, and not as the Son of God. But it is difficult to understand how a man, born in the station that Jesus was born in, without any royal connection, could think that a nation would accept him as its king. It seems to me that the attempt of Jesus to pass himself off upon the Jews as the Messiah promised by the prophets cannot be regarded as the undertaking of one possessed of a sound mind. We can comprehend how a daring political adventurer might try to seat himself upon an empty throne, or how some ambitious individual might stir up the people to a revolt and undertake to lead them to victory, and in this way secure a crown for himself; but we can hardly wonder that the Jews laughed at a man born among the poor and lowly, and who had gathered together a dozen disciples, who proclaimed himself the divinely appointed Messiah and asked to be acknowledged their king.

There is nothing to indicate that Jesus ever attempted by force of arms to seat himself upon the throne of David, nothing to show that he sought to overthrow the government by instigating a rebellion. We cannot account for this strange delusion that possessed his mind that he would be received as the Christ of his people. Such a notion seems the faith of a diseased more than of a rational mind. While it was natural for him to share the faith of his countrymen, and indulge the hope of future national glory for his people, we are unable to see what circumstances in his life should lead him to think himself the fulfilment of the prophecy that a king should be born to the Jews who should free them from Roman oppression. We cannot believe that Jesus expected to prove his claim to the throne of Israel by birth, as the attempt to make him of royal blood has come no nearer than to show that Joseph, his stepfather, could trace his genealogy, with some allowances, back to David.

Jesus could not say to the Jews, "Crown me, for I am the natural heir to the throne. Hand me the scepter of Israel, for the blood of David flows in my veins." He must have looked for some miracle to be wrought in his favor that would turn his rags to purple and his hat to a crown. If he was to be the king of the Jews, it could not be from birthright, for his biographers assert that the Holy Ghost was his father, and there is no mention of any such person that belonged to the house of David. If Jesus claimed to be the Messiah, how can you explain such presumption on his part except by believing that he was insane?

The last hope to save divinity to Jesus is to appeal to his teachings. We are told that the very light of heaven shines in the moral commands of Jesus, and that such transcendent wisdom could have come only from a greater than mortal brain. The superiority of the New Testament ethics exists only in Christian imagination. I will take the two most characteristic sayings of Jesus, and see if we can find any evidence of divinity in them. Jesus taught that whatsoever man should ask God for in prayer he should receive, and also that God, who provided food for the fowls of the air and who clothed the grass of the field, would feed and clothe man.

I would ask the Christian who believes that such teaching as this is divine, if it is true? Does not everyone know that it is false? Does not everyone know that every man, woman, and child might perish from the face of the earth for all that God would do to save them? Does not everyone know that not a single thing that is necessary to human life can be had by prayer? Does not everyone know that the heart of man is the only heart that feels for man; that the hand of man is the only hand that helps man?

Why! prayer has knelt the earth over, and asked to be saved from suffering, to be saved from sin, to be saved from death. But suffering is in every house. Men and women in their blindness go wrong, and the grave reaches out its ghastly arms and takes the young and the old, the fair, the brave, and the true. It is madness to teach that God will answer the prayers of man. It is madness to teach that God will feed the starving and clothe the naked. Such ideas could come only from insanity.

I am amazed at the Christian admiration for Jesus. I cannot account for it.

I can see but little in this character that is worthy of honor or imitation. I can find but little in his teachings that can be followed with advantage to man.

It seems to me strange that educated men, men who are looked upon as mentally gifted, should pretend that the hero of the gospel story lived a life that exceeded the powers of humanity and possessed a wisdom that could not come from human experience. It can be explained only upon the ground that after the mind accepts the Bible as the word of God, it is prepared to stultify itself in any way.

After a fair and impartial reading of the gospel, the world must be convinced that Jesus was not divine, but insane.

Theology in the Public Schools.

W. D. Lesueur in the Canada Educational Monthly.

It must be a great satisfaction to all who are interested in the question of Bible teaching in the public schools to find so competent a writer as the Rev. Mr. Macdonnell coming forward to take part in the discussion. The reverend gentleman finds matter for criticism in my "Open Letter to the Public and High School Teachers of Ontario," published in the December number of this magazine; and, as he seems to call upon me for a further defense of the position I hav taken, I hav much pleasure in responding to the challenge of so courteous and reasonable—let me add so liberal—an opponent.

Let us see what it is we want to know. We want to know, if I mistake not, whether in a country like Canada, in which there is no state church, and, professedly, no state recognition of any particular theology, the Bible should be used in the schools with a warrant from the state that it is the word of God. That is the only question that I hav set myself to discuss. To the use of the Bible as a text-book merely, on a par with other text-books, and subject to the same free handling as other text-books, I hav never objected, nor had occasion to object, for the simple reason that no one has ever proposed such a use of it. Those who demand its use in the schools demand that it shall be used as the word of God, and in no other character. But how is its use in that character exclusivly to be secured? By making it compulsory upon teachers to introduce it to their scholars in that character, and punishing those teachers who present it in any other light. Therefore, I say the question is whether the state should enjoin the use of the Bible in the schools and authoritativly declare it to be the word of God. I hav tried to show cause why the state should not do this. I hav impugned the competency of the state to decide any such question. I hav maintained that it is not the business of the state—under our system of government at least—to decide such questions. The case is different where there is a state church acting as a coördinate branch of the government. In that case the secular power can refer to the spiritual authorities all questions of orthodoxy and heterodoxy, and can proceed to visit with condign punishment all heretical persons, and, in a general way, giv effect to the directions of the church in spiritual matters. But here we hav no established spiritual authority to refer to. If Mr. Mowat wants guidance upon a point of law he can consult himself as attorney-general; but if he wants guidance as to the inspiration of the scriptures, there is no one officially qualified and authorized to advise him. Now, it does seem to me that I hav not been fairly met upon this point. No one has ever told me by what authority, or by virtue of what illumination, the state in this province is able to certify that the Bible which it prescribes for use in the public schools is the word of God. One of my former opponents said he did not wish the state to certify or dogmatically assert any such thing. But if the state does not do it, then we hav this situation: Every teacher may present his own view of the Bible to his scholars, and may, if he likes, express the opinion that it is a purely human work and one abounding in errors. If a teacher who advanced these views would be liable to lose his place, then we hav the flagrant injustice of a certain standard of opinion being tacitly set up which the authorities hav not the courage openly to proclaim. If it be said that the people generally are of the opinion that the Bible is the word of God, I ask, as I hav asked before, should the vox populi be decisiv in a question of this nature? If the vox populi undertakes to decide questions of science and criticism, and not only to prescribe text-books for the schools, but to prescribe the opinions that teachers are to hold in regard to those text-books, our educational system will soon be in a queer shape. Seeing that the Rev. Mr. Macdonnell has apparently been following this discussion, as conducted elsewhere, with some interest, I am really sorry he has not done more to help me out of the difficulties under which he has seen me laboring as to the right and the ability of the state to certify that the Bible is the word of God, so as to secure that it shall be consistently treated as such in the schools. I know that there are thousands who will see nothing in this, but I write not for people who are incapable of reflection, but for those who are accustomed to think, and who know what it is to think candidly; and I do not believe that any man at once candid and intelligent will say that there is no difficulty whatever in the case as I present it.

My able opponent assumes that I object to all religious teaching in the schools, and he joins issue with me, therefore, upon that point. He says, in an eloquent passage, that "the best moral results can not be attained without the distinct recognition of the living God, in whom we liv and move and hav our being, without whom not a sparrow shall fall to the ground, . . . who so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten son," etc. This language comes home to us, doubtless, with all the force of long familiarity and of many blended associations; but when we come to consider it calmly and dispassionately as the language in which teachers are to address their pupils in our public schools, does it seem altogether suitable? It is certainly the language of sentiment, of emotion, but is it language that represents demonstrable truth? What we know about sparrows and many other tribes of animals—not excluding man—is that, as a matter of fact, they die from time to time by thousands and tens of thousands of cold and starvation. It may hav a soothing effect upon some minds to picture to themselvs an infinit father quiescently surveying the horrors of an Irish, an Indian, or a Chinese famin; and, if so, I should be the last to wish to deprive them of such a satisfaction. I only think that, before we expatiate upon God's care for sparrows, the great facts and laws of animal life should be faithfully presented; otherwise there may be a shock to faith when, at a later period, those facts and laws become known. The study of nature reveals no special care for sparrows any more than for sparrow-hawks. It shows us that there is no cessation in the struggle for existence, and that those who survive do so at the expense of weaker competitors. To speak candidly, I do not see how, in teaching children, we can make anything of the conception of the divine interest in sparrows unless we make our appeal conclusivly to emotion, and discourage to the utmost all reflection upon the facts of the case. Then, with regard to God giving his son, I would ask with all seriousness to what order of truths this belongs. Is it a truth of history? If so, what degree of certainty attaches to it as such? Is it as certain as that Cæsar was assassinated, or that Alexander overthrew the Persian empire? Supposing it to be a tolerably well-attested fact of history, what blame will be incurred by one who, being a little more exacting on the score of evidence than the majority of people, finds himself unable to believe it on the evidence offered? The Rev. Mr. Macdonnell says that the teacher who ignores this truth in his teaching "makes a grievous mistake." If the teacher is to teach it, how are the scholars to receive it? In silence and submission or in a spirit of reflection and inquiry? Will the teacher be prepared to explain just what believing on the son means, and how such belief saves people from perishing, and what perishing means, and what eternal life means? I do not see why a thoughtful pupil should not be at liberty to ask, in a respectful manner, any questions whatever bearing on the subject; nor do I see why, in the event of his asking such questions, he should be obliged to be satisfied with any answers that did not come home to his intelligence. If the teacher were explaining the movements of the earth, a scholar would be highly approved for showing his interest in the subject by asking questions. Nothing, indeed, is more helpful to a teacher who has any real knowledge to convey to his scholars than to hav questions asked in regard to those points which his explanations hav not made quite clear. Why should it be otherwise in the case supposed? But if we imagin a conversation opened such as continually takes place in school upon other topics of study, what view of "belief on the son" is the teacher going to take? To believe on a person is not a usual phrase in English outside of the Bible, and a teacher might be asked in the first place to explain the use of the preposition. This point passed, there would be the much more important one as to whether belief on the son meant acceptance of his teaching or faith in the "atonement." To many good Christians the doctrin of the atonement, as generally presented in past times, is highly repugnant. They would not wish their children taught that, because Jesus bore a certain weight of anguish, physical and mental, God the father was able to see his way to forgiving his earthly children their sins against his law. Some of my readers will remember the strong language of reprobation applied by the Rev. F. W. Robertson to this theory, which, however, is still largely entertained in the Christian world. Mr. Moody is a teacher very highly thought of by the Christian millions. He has given his views of faith on Christ in his famous sermon on "The Blood," and I don't think he would giv a rush for faith that merely meant acceptance of, and devotion to, a certain type of character. Let us, therefore, understand one another. When the Rev. Mr. Macdonnell says that the teacher makes a grievous mistake who in the moral training of children ignores the doctrin of salvation through faith in Christ, does he want the teacher to take his stand with Mr. Moody on "the blood," or has he a different idea in view? I think I am entitled to ask this question and expect an answer, for surely the expressions "belief on the son," "salvation by faith," do not explain themselvs.

I know that faith in incantations is not altogether a thing of the past, and I quite believe that there are some, perhaps many, who simply want the teacher to utter some pious words at the opening of the school, leaving the scholars to take them—so far as they listen at all—in whatever conventional sense they may be accustomed to apply to them. It is quite needless to say that I do not place the Rev. Mr. Macdonnell in this class. He shows that he does not belong to it by specifying the particular views he wishes to hav brought forward in the schools, and I am sure he will go further and tell us how he would hav some of these views developed and illustrated. The effects, I may remark, of the incantation plan are visible on every hand—visible in the shocking ignorance of biblical phraseology, biblical history, biblical everything on the part of people who hear the Bible read, if not daily, at least once or twice a week, their lives through. To my mind it is little short of miraculous how amazingly small a tincture of biblical knowledge is to-day possessed by thousands who, if they follow with the least shade of interest the Bible readings given in their hearing, would necessarily hav a most extensiv acquaintance with the sacred writings. My critic himself speaks of "the ignorance of the contents of the Bible which is now so lamentable." He might hav said "phenomenal" as well as "lamentable," for it is phenomenal; and the only explanation I can offer is that to a vast number of people, old and young, Bible readings are regarded as mere incantations—the utterance of words which, by some intrinsic virtue quite independent of their meaning, are expected to work good results, and the mere listening to which—quite independently of any effort to catch sense—is in itself a meritorious act. I hav thought of the matter a good deal, and I know of no theory except the incantation theory that will explain the facts.

I note with much pleasure the liberal stand taken by my critic upon one or two points raised in my "Open Letter." He sees no reason in the world why the same kind of information which we giv in regard to Homer should not be given in regard to the Bible—"why an intelligent child (query, not the average ones?) should not be told that there is uncertainty as to the authorship of some of the books of the Bible, and different opinions as to the dates at which some of them were composed." "We need hav no fear," he proceeds, "as to all the facts that hav been ascertained about the Bible being made known." But how about the facts that hav not been "ascertained?" Are they to be taught or must teachers confine themselvs rigorously to such facts as hav been conclusivly established? The Rev. Mr. Macdonnell puts in a caution against troubling the minds of the children with "the unverified theories and speculations of clever men, or about unconfirmed suspicions or assertions of inaccuracy on the part of biblical writers as to matters of science or history." This is good as far as it goes, but how about unverified theories that hav become incorporated with current beliefs. Will Mr. Macdonnell say there are none such? I do not believe he will. How then, I ask, in regard to such unverified matters? How about "unconfirmed assertions," not of inaccuracy, but of accuracy, on the part of the authors of the books of scripture. Is the rule to be that whatever antiquity, greedy of marvels and destitute of all canons of scientific criticism, has handed down to us is to be believed, unless some one can bring forward absolute evidence of its falsity in a given case?

> Creditur olim,
> Velifactus Athos et quidquid Græcia mendax,
> Audet in historia.

If the same easy faith is to be given to every statement of scripture, while the theories and statements of "clever men" are to be subjected to the severest examination and only accepted, if it all, when the evidence in their favor is overwhelming, it is to be feared that the historic sense of our school-children will be developed in a very one-sided manner.

It is a great satisfaction to hav to deal with a candid opponent. Had the Rev. Mr. Macdonnell not been a candid man, and a brave man too, he would not hav admitted, as frankly as he has done, the truth of my statement that many persons hav little idea how repugnant much that is contained in the Bible is to the instinctiv morality of children. The explanation he givs of the fact has the merit of familiarity, but I fail to see that it has any other. Christ himself, he observes, has told us that many things were suffered in earlier times on account of the hardness of men's hearts. Alas, alas, that won't do. It is not the hardness of men's hearts that troubles us in the Bible history; it is the distinct attribution to the deity of the worst deeds that the book records. Who hardened Pharaoh's heart? What had the hardness of men's hearts to do with the punishment inflicted at an earlier period upon the unfortunate Egyptians on account of an act into which their king was directly led by the duplicity and cowardice of the father of the faithful? What had the hardness of men's hearts to do with the smiting to death of the well-meaning Uzzah? What had the hardness of men's hearts to do with the express commands given by Jehovah to the Israelites to wage a war of utter extermination against the unhappy inhabitants of Palestine? When Saul was not hard-hearted enough to cut the trembling Agag down in the place where he stood, who was it that rushed forward and hewed the wretched captiv in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal? It was Samuel the priest of the Lord and the utterer of his counsel. What had the hardness of men's hearts to do with the slaughter of some scores of thousands of King David's subjects for the offense committed by the king in numbering the people? If it be said that God was not the author of these things, but that the hardness of men's hearts was such that they required to hav these deeds of cruelty and caprice attributed to their God in order that they might fear him at all, it becomes a serious question how far a book which records such enormities and represents God as having either wrought them himself or enjoined them on others is profitable reading for the children of to-day.

There is another point of view from which the "hardness of heart" theory will not work. If the truer precepts of the New Testament were not applicable to the ancient Jews, how is that they were applicable to the Greek and Roman world that had had no such special enlightenment or instruction as had been vouchsafed to the Jewish race? We do not read that Paul, on account of the hardness of heart of his Ephesian and Corinthian converts, was compelled to deliver to them very imperfect moral precepts, or to represent God to them in any doubtful, not to say repellent, light. Whence or how had these gentile "dogs," as a zealous Jew would hav called them, obtained a preparation of heart for the higher teachings of Christianity?

The Rev. Mr. Macdonnell is persuaded that the number is very small of those who would object to the teaching of the Bible in the schools. Here let me explain: To the reading of the Bible in the schools and to the giving of moral instruction more or less founded thereon, I would personally make but slight objection, were it not for the domineering and tyrannical spirit in which the right of the majority to hav such readings and teachings has been insisted on by some. The part that I hav taken in this discussion has been inspired not by hostility to the Bible, but by hostility to tyranny and intolerance. I feel that this is a case in which the minority has rights no less sacred than those of the majority; and as a matter of right I cannot concede that the majority should claim to lay hold of the machinery of the state for the propagation of their special theological views. As to what proportion of the public school teachers hold in a general way to "advanced" opinions, I can perhaps help the Rev. Mr. Macdonnell to an estimate. He says he supposes them to be extremely few. Eleven years ago there was formed in the city in which I reside a society which gave itself the name of the "Progressiv Society." It was formed entirely on Freethought lines, and out of the dozen, at the most, of persons who constituted the original membership four were public school teachers. Two ex-teachers subsequently joined, and are still on the roll of members. At least two other teachers of the city hav expressed themselvs to me as being in accord with the views of the society, and not long ago I received a letter from an ex-teacher (high school master I think) stating that he had better opportunities than most for knowing the views of the teaching body, and that he could assure me that, in the present controversy, a very large proportion of them were on my side. The Rev. Mr. Macdonnell says, at one moment, that perhaps there might be a conscience clause for teachers as well as for scholars; but as he goes on at once to say that a man who holds non-Christian opinions cannot reasonably hope for employment as a teacher in a Christian community, it is a little hard to know just what he means on this point.

Let me first answer one question put by my respected opponent, and I hav done. He wan's to know whether I would approve of any religious element in the education given in the public schools. My answer shall be brief: I don't believe that one human being can instruct another human being about God. The man who undertakes to demonstrate God, in any sense of the verb "demonstrate," undertakes more than he can accomplish. We recognize physical laws as operativ in the universe of matter, and moral laws as operativ in human society; and it is doubtless natural to the great majority of minds to refer such laws to God as their author. But all that is open to our study is the orderly succession of cause and effect in the universe. In this direction we can make unceasing progress; and my idea is that the most religious education of all would be one in which a constant effort would be made to unfold the laws of the universe, and to deduce therefrom the highest lessons they are adapted to teach, with a view to keeping alive and vigorous the correspondence between outward law and inward obligation. Under such an education I believe that whatever thoughts of God were of a nature to elevate the mind and purify the heart would spontaneously suggest themselvs. We should then hav done with incantations, and all progress in knowledge would be progress toward the perfecting of human nature.

The American Secular Union.

Official Call for Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Local Secular Unions, Life, Charter, and Annual Members, and all Liberal citizens who support the Nine Demands of Secularism, Greeting:

You are hereby invited to attend the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, which will convene at Lafayette Hall, Wood street, near 4th, Pittsburgh, Pa., Friday, October 5, 1888, at 10 A.M., for a four days' session—5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th inclusiv.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State or Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Unions are entitled to seats and votes in this Annual Congress. Each Local Secular Union is entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates. Annual Members who pay or hav paid $1 in the national treasury are entitled to seats, but not to votes, except by unanimous consent of the Congress.

This Congress will specially consider practical questions tending to further agitation for taxation of church property; the abrogation of state aid to sectarian institutions; abolition of state, national, military, and prison chaplaincies; repeal of judicial oaths, Sunday and other oppressiv and unjust ecclesiastical laws; nullification of attempts to subvert our Constitution by a legal recognition of Theism in the American Magna Charta, and such other measures as will not merely thwart intended theological encroachments, but will absolutely expunge from our laws, state and federal, such insidious acts as hav already crept in to blot out mental freedom from our republic.

It is to be hoped that the addresses delivered will deal with the practical issues of the organization, so that there will be such an awakening of the people to these vital questions of the hour that a revival of the instinct of liberty and justice for all will necessarily result; that again from the Keystone state—the birthplace of our association—the clarion voice of freedom shall vibrate throughout the land.

Pittsburgh being situated almost in the center of a district containing many of our most distinguished workers, thinkers, and writers, besides the activ host within its limits, there is little doubt but that this Congress will be a glorious gathering of the forces who stand for mental liberty, as expressed in the desire for complete Secularization of the government.

S. P. PUTNAM, Pres.
E. A. STEVENS, Sec.
CHAS. ECKHARD, Treas.

To the Members of the American Secular Union.

There are imperativ reasons why, after the coming Congress at Pittsburgh, I should refuse activ official connection with the American Secular Union. These reasons do not proceed out of any distrust of the Union, but from an increased belief in its success and the triumph of Liberalism throughout the land. It is not the meagerness of the result that compels withdrawal from this sphere of action, but the very greatness of the result. It is because there is so much to do that selection is necessary as to the field of effort.

When I accepted the presidency of the Union at Chicago I did not anticipate the enterprise upon the Pacific coast. I expected to devote myself mainly to lecturing throughout the states and so be able to aid the Union at any point. But the establishment of Freethought in San Francisco has opened such vast and varied opportunities for labor that I am simply compelled to withdraw from the Eastern field for the next few years, and concentrate my energies upon the Pacific coast.

From Denver to San Francisco I shall find constant employment, organizing and strengthening the Liberal party by lectures and Freethought, and therefore I can no longer devote myself in a practical way to the purely national work. Under these circumstances, as I cannot be in intimate communication with Eastern friends, it is best not to occupy a position whose duties I must to a certain extent neglect on account of other fields of effort. If I could perform any effectual service as president of the Union, I should be ready to do so and accept the honor and responsibility with joy, but when I find that I can do just as good service to the Union as a private in the ranks, and that the official position can be better filled by somebody else, then my devotion to the Union leaves no other course but to refuse the office, while I shall still continue to aid in another capacity.

It is evident that the main work of the Union, at present, must be done in the East. In order to be effectual, the board of directors should be close together. There should be three in Chicago in immediate communication with the secretary. It weakens the action of the Union to hav the president and the secretary three thousand miles apart. The wheels will not run smoothly when it takes a fortnight for a reply to a question which, for the convenience and oftentime success of the secretary's enterprises, should be answered in a day. Delays are vexatious and sometimes dangerous, and the secretary, who is the main worker, must hav his advisers and co-workers at hand.

I hav chosen the Pacific coast for my home, and for the labor of coming years. This choice necessitates a withdrawal from the activ government of the Union in favor of some one who is nearer the headquarters; while I can still support the Union effectually by non-official coöperation.

In thus withdrawing for the sake of greater usefulness to all concerned, I wish to state frankly my views of the work of the Union. It has been subject to many criticisms. Some of these I wish to answer.

It has been said that "Putnam has carried the Union around in his vest pocket, and has used it simply for personal advancement." Nothing is further from the truth. I should hav been better off to-day pecuniarily if I had never had any connection with the Union. If four years ago I had entered the field simply as a lecturer, dependent upon my own energies, I should hav avoided many difficulties and hav received a larger remuneration. All the Unions in the world will not make one successful in the Liberal lecture field. In no case whatever has my official connection with the Union given me more enthusiastic reception or better pay. In every instance I hav had to win by personal effort. The American people are not so constituted that the patronage of any organization will make a lecturer acceptable. He must stand on his own merits. No amount of recommendations will transform dullness into power.

I hav not endeavored to shape the policy of the Union to my own notions. I hav not tried, in any instance, to make the Union subservient to my profit. The Liberals of this country are not the kind of people to be hoodwinked. None can use them, nor dictate to them. They allow no master. If my policy has been adopted, it is because that policy has expressed the common sense of the Liberals of this country. It is because by my acquaintance with Liberals, I hav known what is the general desire, and hav put that desire into execution. My policy has been unanimously sustained by every Congress from Cassadaga to Chicago in spite of adverse criticism.

It is folly to say that a Congress of Liberals can be "fixed." There has always been the amplest freedom and everybody has said his say, and in the end the methods adopted hav been thoroughly justified. I hav had the cordial support of the vast majority of the activ Liberals of this country; and this is not because I hav had any personal policy, but because I hav endeavored to meet the demands of the situation. I hav not been the master but the servant of the Union in honorable labor.

Many criticisms hav been made because I hav devoted almost all my time to the lecture field. There was no other course to pursue. Had I remained in New York city—in a home office—the Union would to-day be dead. The proof is palpable to all who know the history of the Union. It was absolutely necessary that I should travel from the Atlantic to the Pacific in order to arouse the dormant life of Liberalism and make fellowship. The lecture tours were successful. I undertook them on my own responsibility. The Liberals generously responded, and I am willing to leave my work to the judgment of all who are interested in the advance of the Union. I think now that a home office is better, and that the secretary should not be a traveling lecturer; but the opportunity for a home office was only made by two years' hard work in the field.

The Union has been criticised for not publishing Sunday-school leaflets, science books, and all the instrumentalities for work by local societies. It is simply impossible for the Union to do this. It has not the means. When there are one hundred live Secular Unions and Sunday-schools in this country, then these instrumentalities can be furnished, and not before. These instrumentalities can't be made out of air. There must be a fountain of support.

Such fault-finding is like cursing a poor man for his poverty, and blaming him for not having a fine house to liv in. The Union is not a rich institution. It is poor—very poor. Outside of the lecture fees, the income has been only a few hundred dollars each year. The Union has used its money to the best advantage. There has been no waste. This is fully apparent to anyone who will examin the records. To condemn the Union for not doing what it would take ten times its income to do is a cruel folly, and unworthy of any generous-minded Liberal. The funds of the Union hav not been misdirected. If the Union does not do all the good work that lies before it, it is simply because it has not the means. Let those who criticise the Union for not doing certain things of importance go to work and raise the funds, and giv it a chance to do these things, and not try to destroy the Union on account of the poverty of its resources.

Poor though it is, the Union has done a noble work. I am satisfied that the Liberals of America will not permit it to be destroyed simply because it is poor and struggling, and not rich and flourishing. I stand by the Union, I believe in the Union, and I will work for the Union more heartily than ever. It is a burning shame to the Liberals of this country if they will not sustain a national organization, on a platform—the Nine Demands—which everybody can support. I want a union of the Liberals of America, for the churches are powerful and aggressiv, and do force and will force injustice upon us; and if we are men, we will resist, and to resist successfully we must combine.

The selection of Mr. Stevens for secretary was wise and opportune. He is the man for the place. He has given us new life and hope. He did not seek office. It was the unanimous desire of the Congress that he accept it. He did so with generous devotion. Amid many difficulties and discouragements, his administration has been successful. With proper support, he will make the Union a power.

The secretary is the practical working force of the organization. The president and the other directors are mainly advisory. The secretary needs their wise coöperation, but his own personal effort is what makes the influence of the Union. He must be a worker. The board of directors should be representativ Liberals, who hav the confidence of the public, and will make harmony in the ranks. The best secretary can do but little without the united assistance of activ Liberals. Mr. Stevens should be kept in his position. His ability is unquestioned. His earnestness is inspiring.

I look forward to a bright, harmonious Congress. Our Pittsburgh friends hav never lowered the flag. They will giv, I believe, a grander impulse than ever.

In union with our Eastern friends, the Pacific coast will do its share. A world in itself, it needs its own methods and instrumentalities, but Liberals here are American citizens, and we shall work for the American republic, and for equal rights and impartial liberty wherever the flag of our Union waves. To do my work more effectually in the Far West, I must sever my official connection with the national organization, but only as a private in the ranks to serve it with greater hope and enthusiasm.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Pacific Coast, July 28, 1888.

The Quaker City.

It was nearing the close of that May-time which is the morning of summer, when one fair, bright day I was borne away to the southward, through long, shining levels of grassy sea, shot over with yellow dandelion gleams like little baby sunshines playing in the sink and swell of the emerald waves. Up from that silent, dreaming, hazy, green ocean came floating the songs of its toilers; and the light-bathed air which rested above it grew redolent with perfume, purple and silver with the sheen of the wings floating through it. And night came down like the gathered brooding of those wings, softly, slowly, darkly—only where a lost moonbeam wandered through the chancel of Silence and paused for a moment to rest beneath the hovering shadow.

What a strange contrast was this day which had closed to that which dawned in the morrow's east! Scarcely less wild than the Pennsylvania mountains themselvs, scarcely less changing than those winding streams, those hills in the distance where the purple twilights always lie, those jagged piles of nature's giant masonry, those scarred summits with their eternal frown like that which rests above the sightless eyeballs of the blind, seeking, always seeking for the light that never comes, those wonderful gleams of uplifted color, those flashes of rays and dashes of starlessness; scarcely less changing than this wondrous panorama which is fairly hurled against the sight with the rapidity of lightning-darts, are those massy ranges of cloudy peaks, those lakes of blue, those wealths of troubled tears, those dips of golden sun, those quiverings upon the face of nature such as dwell upon the mouth ere it breaks into sobs or laughter, those shadowy embodiments of shifting human passion which greet the eye when it is lifted to the changing skies. Now the hills climb to kiss the clouds, now the clouds sink to hug the hills, and come curling down off the mountain side as if some king among them had blown a whiff of smoke from his gray lips; now we seem pressed and gathered into the very bosom of gloom, we shoot into a tunnel—the darkness becomes almost palpable, it is like a living thing stealing around and clutching your throat; you vaguely wonder if—if—"some horrid male creature is"—presto, we dart into the light! There is a sweep of glittering sunshine that fairly stuns the eye; the mournful little streams of rain on your window which hav been patiently running in crooked lines down the glass are a bedazzlement of smiling glory; the stern gray rocks drip light. "Ah," says the pious individual across the aisle, "how typical of the resurrection!" And he proceeds with some pretty nonsense about a worm and a butterfly. Behold how habitual trains of thought lead people in far-sundered channels. Said I to myself, conscious than my audience if slim was at least appreciativ, "How typical of the glory of freedom! And won't it be fine if we can ever get tunneled through the mountains of ignorance, and people find out that this isn't a vale of tears after all!"

The heels of Time were treading upon twilight when I set my feet on terra firma, and, after methodical examination, discovered that I was not running around myself, and the platform stationary. On passing through the—what shall I call it, it looks like a cattle-guard?—I began looking earnestly for a little gentleman with a Wettstein badge, who was to be the hard-working secretary of Friendship Liberal League. Presently I heard a gentle voice speak my name, and turning about I met the leveled glance of three pair of bright dark eyes, set respectivly in three little gentlemen's heads. I suppose one's ideas would be naturally confused under the circumstance; but while engaged in the remarkable task of adjusting names to these three individuals in a way which mixed them up so their own mothers wouldn't hav known them, one very definit idea took possession of my brain, and I hugged it with infinit delight. This was, that there is an advantage in being born in the backwoods of Michigan—one has a chance to grow—these three little gentlemen were so very little.

Yet as it is said that valuable articles are often done up in small parcels, I shortly discovered that this trinity of big eyes and small bodies contained about as valuable material as can be found anywhere in the Liberal ranks. Secretary Longford has the best qualities which should characterize the incumbent of that arduous office—faithfulness, impartiality, sacrificial devotion to the cause, and a quiet persistency that simply smiles at obstacles. The merry little Bishop who kept amusing us with his quaint speeches is a model for all secular bishops; and Mr. Elliott is a whole entertainment committee in himself.

The following afternoon, before the lectures, I had the pleasure of meeting President Shaw, whose magnificent bearing reminded me of one of our stately Northern pines, and whose broad, generous, noble conception of life and its aims is more like the natural product of the West rather than the law-cursed city of Philadelphia.

I hav never addressed an audience of finer men and women than that which greeted me that Sunday afternoon, yet it was preëminently an Eastern audience. To compare it with that which had greeted me in Chicago some two weeks previous was to compare the spirit of the East and the spirit of the West, the star-flashing of the occident with the sun-gleam of the orient. But the star is that which trembles on the morning's verge presaging the dawn; the sun-gleam that of a sweet, ripe afternoon in June. And it is very hard to say which light we love best.

In the evening a good fairy came to me (the only fairy I believe in), and gave me her gentle hand, wishing me to accept the beautiful bouquet which adorned the speaker's stand. They say that flowers speak. I shall long remember the message of that pure white lily, standing like a fair queen in the center of her little, blooming kingdom. There was nothing more sweet and snowy than that lily, save the dear heart and the gentle hand of Mrs. Harker.

A gentleman, whose name I did not catch, but which appeared to variate from Brotherhood, Botherhead, Blubberhead, Bubblehead, Buddinghead, to Blunderhead, took occasion to allude to my balancing the starvation of millions against the mandates of Jehovah as an argument for his abolishment as a "wish-wash argument" from a "woman of your sex, madam." I never before so thoroughly appreciated Mr. Watts's remark concerning "old women of both sexes." As the gentleman afterward scolded the audience for not applauding his remarks, saying it was evident they preferred the ice-cream and confectioneries of public speaking to good solid "beefsteak," I conclude that to cure him of his mistaken impression concerning the wishy-washiness of starvation, it would be a good plan to cut down his daily allowance of beefsteak. Will our Philadelphia friends please see to his case?

In response to the appeal for funds to sustain the national Union, Mr. J. W. Black, one of its vice-presidents, headed the list with a "V;" several others gave smaller sums, $9 in all being contributed. The names of President Putnam and Secretary Stevens were greeted with applause—a genuin tribute to the administration, and a sign that the self-sacrificing efforts of these gentlemen are appreciated. And I am glad to pay my tribute, faint as it is, to those noble Liberals who, in the city where the iron tongue of American liberty first spoke, yet hear the chains of bygone ages clank; who stand almost in the shadow of the whipping-post; who behold a thousand churches, blocks where mental liberty is daily and hourly beheaded; who feel the curse of "church and state" like a hot, close mantle round them, yet dare to stand in the midst of all and say, boldly and fearlessly, "I despise your shackles; I ignore your priestly bondage; I defy your authority to chain my mind; I laugh at your superstition; I stand for truth, liberty, and justice." I bow to those men and those women; and I thank them for their strength, which givs me strength.

Remaining in the city for some time, I visited various of its institutions, among which was that bone of contention, Girard College. And as Providence provided a very interesting treat to your wicked subscriber (which was a mistake of diplomacy on the part of P.), I will relate some details to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in my next.

VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

SHELTON'S POINT, WASH. TERR., June 30th, July 1st.—This city in embryo is the terminus of the Satsop logging railroad. Logs are run in here from all the logging-camps between Shelton and Satsop and dumped into the bay jutting from the Skokomish river. This place is named after that kind-hearted and exemplary old Infidel, David Shelton, a pioneer woodsman and mine prospector of this territory, and the first settler in this section. Only a few years ago and the nearest post-office, mill, or store was at Olympia, about twenty five miles away. He has often paddled his canoe to Olympia and back the same day. When his two daughters went shopping a canoe was their only mode of conveyance. They had to "paddle their own canoe" to Olympia. Two years and a half ago there were but three dwellings in twenty miles; now this is a thriving, prosperous village. Of course it is yet in the woods; a rough country, primitiv, but very rapidly developing.

The rain, every day during the month, has been unprecedented; they expect such weather here in winter, but in summer it is as unlooked for as it is unwelcome.

Under any circumstances the evenings just before the Fourth of July are unfavorable to lectures, but the long, severe rains had made logging roads impassable. Many camps had discharged the majority of their hands; those kept on had about all gone or were going to Seattle or Olympia to celebrate the Fourth. I was therefore alike pleased and surprised to find so large an attendance at each of the three lectures. The eager purchase of pamphlets and the avidity evinced in securing sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER was indisputable evidence of the great interest awakened by the first Liberal lectures ever delivered here.

W. H. Kneeland, a genuin Liberal and an old friend and subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, has fitted up a beautiful park for the use of tourists and pleasure parties. He has erected a mammoth dancing pavilion, laid out croquet grounds and a lawn-tennis park, put up swings, rustic seats, and every comfort and convenience. He is now deciding on plans for the erection of a first-class sportsman's and tourist's hotel. There is abundance of game in the woods, and the Goldsboro creek abounds in trout, from the little half-pounders to the festiv four-pound beauties.

Fruits, vegetables, and flowers grow in profusion. I should like to visit Shelton again five years hence, and witness its wonderful advancement, and once more greet the many friends I bade good-bye to at Shelton's Point.

ELMA, WASH. TERR., July 3d, 5th, 6th.—I started early on Monday morning in Friend Shelton's wagon to Kamilche, where I could take a logging train for Willie's camp, from whence I was to walk to Dan Varner's ranch, and he would take me with his team to Elma. It poured of rain; by a rough road that tested the driver's skill in dodging stumps and roots and putting on the brake down the sudden deep holes, I arrived at Kamilche about 10 A.M., and received the very encouraging information, "If the train did go at all 'till after the Fourth,' it would do so about 1 P.M. It was doubtful, as but very few hands were at work in the woods, and there were no logs to come down." Pleasant prospect! No stage; no one there who had a team; no passable road if they had. There was only the company's store and half a dozen houses in the clearing. But fortune favored. The train did go. I mounted a flat car, and sat on my trunk. Henceforth I certainly ought to keep, for I was thoroughly smoked and elaborately tattooed with the flying soot and cinders blowing directly down on me from the smokestack of the locomotiv for the entire distance. Self and baggage were dumped at Willie's camp. Train went no farther; but it was the other Willie's camp I had to reach, over a mile farther on. I left my baggage in the woods, and tramped the track. Immense trees from 200 to 250 feet high line each side of the track. When it blows hard these trees sway and lash their tops together, breaking off small branches; a very small branch descending such a great distance would crush the thickest skull it fell on. Quite frequently old trees will topple over. There is not much danger if you can see them in time enough and know which way to run. Reaching the lower camp, I had half a mile to wade over a series of miniature lakes of diverse depths—once called a road. I arrived at Dan Varner's ranch to learn that he had despaired of my arrival and so gone alone to Elma. I hired a youth to mount a horse and go to all adjacent houses, from one to three miles apart, and make liberal offers for a team to take me to Elma, but had no success. All declined, could not be coaxed or hired; so I resignedly slept the night at the ranch. About 7 o'clock good Dan Varner—an out-and-out Liberal—returned, and in the morning he took me to Elma.

Elma is a very quiet little village, but contains as many real good folks to the acre in proportion to its population as any town in the territory. John Carney, the postmaster and principal merchant, T. C. Chilcote, and Friend McLane are an unsurpassable trinity of whole-souled, zealous workers for Liberalism, while the Macdonald family—well, if there are any second-rate Macdonalds between New York and this coast, I hav failed to even hear of them. Despite being one day behind my appointment, I had a rousing good house to greet me on the evening before the Fourth. I spent the Fourth of July at the McLane ranch, and enjoyed a glorious good visit at their home in the wild woods, one mile and a half from Elma. There is great comfort, but no pretense of style—kind, honest-hearted people, men and women of grit, independence, and enterprise, chopping a home out of the woods; every additional comfort and convenience more dearly prized because earned by hard work. They are happy, prosperous, contented; their only excitement the occasional visits of black bears, cougars, and wildcats.

I delivered three lectures at Elma, the first Liberal lectures ever delivered there, and had crowded houses, despite the Fourth of July celebration and the apathy and inertia that usually follow.

The two little McLane boys sang some humorous and appropriate songs very cleverly, and were deservedly applauded. I sold a large quantity of Liberal publications, and obtained several new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. C. B. REYNOLDS.

The Mediums Decline.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was in hopes to hav responded sooner to Mr. McArthur's suggestion in your issue of June 16th that I should further investigate slate-writing. It is not my fault that I hav not been able to do so. The trouble is that up to this date I hav been unable to come en rapport with a medium prepared to write between slates screwed together.

Mr. Evans, who gave me the specimens I hav already received, is so busy that he cannot find time to attend to it. I dropped him a note immediately after receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER. The following from his reply explains itself:

G. E Macdonald Esq Dear Sir yours recieved & contents noted I regret to say that i hav so many engagements on at present that it would be impossible for me to name any date for a few weeks I leave for Austrailia in August and therefore am rushed on account of my early departure.

Mr. Evans adds enough to the above to assure me of his respect and to say that he hopes to giv me a séance before he leaves for Austrailia (which as he writes it has an i to spare), and that after he gets there he will be able to swell our subscription list.

I further wrote to Mr. Evans concerning the matter, and I got the reply, in effect, that when he desired to see me he would notify me by due course of mail.

I hav communicated with Mr. Colby, another local slate-writing medium, with no better success. He agreed to call at the Freethought office, but did not do so. I shall wait patiently for an opportunity to put Mr. McArthur's suggestion in practice, and will report duly through the columns of Freethought.

God and the Bible.

There are many who no longer look upon the Old Testament as the inspired word of God. They regard it as an old cast-off garment or as a lifeless corpse, having no power either for good or ill.

But if the garment be infected, it becomes a matter of the highest interest to the entire community, and a corpse left above ground might reduce many healthy people to corpses. Very few individuals can be indifferent to an infected garment or a putrid carcass.

As long as Christian lunatics insist that God commands us to wear these garments, and as long as they declare that the odor arising from a carcass is healthful, it is but natural that the well-wisher of his race should endeavor to break the spell of the lunatic and make him see the foolishness and danger of his course. As long as men believe that the Bible is inspired, their influence will tend to block the road of progress. Men who believe infected clothing to be healthy, will try to induce everybody to wear it.

The Bible acts as a yoke which couples us to the ignorant and barbarous past, whereas every tendency ought to be toward a higher civilization.

While scientists and humanitarians are striving to bring the masses up on higher and holier ground, Bible believers are trying to bind them to the dead corpse of the past.

Whoever attempts to lead the people up to a higher civilization will find to his dismay that they are coupled by the Bible to a half-civilized people who had no respect for the rights of women; who believed in witches, ghosts, prophets, and miracles; who roamed about and lived in tents, and who were almost constantly engaged in some plundering expedition. A people who respected neither the age, sex, or condition of their enemies; who murdered old women and helpless children and turned young women over to a brutal soldiery, and who regarded everything as lawful prey which they could obtain by stealth or through power. A people who believed that God not only sanctioned these savage acts, but absolutely commanded them; a people who believed in superstitions so degrading as to shame a Kaffir; a people who believed that an unchangeable God, clothed with supreme power and infinit knowledge, who established the laws of the universe, was driven into such straits as to be compelled to violate them.

There are those who believe that time spent in demolishing these effete ideas is mainly wasted. But it should be remembered that the most ardent workers of the present day are not engaged in breaking the yoke which binds us to these barbaric customs and superstitions of ancient times, but in an endeavor to subvert the government and to turn the shadow back on the dial three thousand years by making the laws and customs of these half-developed people the supreme law of the land.

Not only this, but the cry goes up from day to day to hav these absurd ideas, and all the obscenity, vulgarity, and brutality of an ancient and semi-barbarous people, introduced into the schools, and held up as a mirror to the young to reflect to them their duty through the walks of life. Moreover, men who are regarded by thousands as occupying the highest positions in society, and who attract crowds of impressible listeners, are declaring from hundreds of pulpits that these inhuman customs were sanctioned by God, and that the book in which they are written is his holy word, and that we are most acceptable to God when we imitate the diabolical acts therein recorded.

How long is it since one of the most noted divines, before a multitude, ridiculed those who believe the Bible only "in spots," and declared that "every chapter and verse and word was inspired?" It requires no astute logician to show what an important part the old book plays with our civilization. It not only blocks our progress, but in some instances drags us back. A religious paper warns its readers to beware of pretended science which contradicts the Bible. I heard a lady say that she could learn more science in the book of Genesis than from all other books. And thus the masses are kept shuffling around this old rotten carcass instead of exploring the fields of nature, and are mere mental and moral dwarfs. The young are taught that David was a man after God's own heart, and this idea is firmly impressed upon the mind. In after years they read about his bloody and inhuman transactions, about his numerous wives and concubines, and what conclusion can they arrive at only that such things are right? I tell you it affects us on every hand. It smirches the morals and cripples the mind. This old record of rape and robbery is still exerting an influence over almost every man who writes a book. It has to do with the shaping of nearly every character in all Christian countries. Its disgusting finger-marks are seen all through our literature. It pulls us down instead of elevating us. Its highest morality would set us back more than a thousand years. Its very best characters were bad men, and every well-wisher of his race ought to be interested in robbing this burlesque of its sanctity, so that it shall retard our progress no more.

Think of comparing Moses and David and Solomon and Joshua, and even the wisest and best Bible characters, with such men as Jefferson, Adams, Webster, Lincoln, Ingersoll, Humboldt, Darwin, and many others.

Then think of the morals of Bible times as compared with the morals of the present day. Even the chosen of God got drunk and were guilty of the most beastly and unnatural incest. They plundered and murdered, they were bloodthirsty and tyrannical, they had the salacious propensities of the brute, and polygamy was a crowning virtue.

The thugs of India would gain by a comparison with what might be considered the lower masses, both in intelligence and decency, in Bible times. They were given to sodomy and woman-stealing, to rape and rascality, to rudeness and robbery—in short, they were a sort of human animal whom to see would be to loathe.

Think of seventy thousand professionals in this country opposing every advance movement, trying to lead us back to the ignorance and brutality of primitiv times—holding up murderous and polygamous characters as set forth in the Bible as worthy of imitation and approved of God! Oh, what a falling off there would be if the seventy thousand should succeed! Once cut us loose from this dead weight and who could predict the progress we would make?

Why has every attempt of the wise and good to better the conditions of the race met with such opposition from the church? Simply because to move onward and upward is to get away from the Bible. Any deviation from the Bible must necessarily bring down the hatred and persecution of the church. To please the church is to stand still. To shun hell you must liv a godlike life. To be godlike is to imitate David and Solomon and Joshua. In other words, go back to a half-savage state.

Cannot anyone see how science and every progressiv movement are compelled to drag this Christian clog behind them? "Search the scriptures," comes from every pulpit in the land. As long as the people can be kept reading this godly old gull-trap they will not read other books which would impart useful information, and will be made the sport of the priest and the minister. As long as the people can be kept singing hymns and saying prayers, and induced to spend their time in church, they will not be dabbling with the sciences or studying works of art, nor will they do much thinking for themselvs.

If there is a class of men to whom the world is indebted, it is the brave workers and bold thinkers; and these are the men who always throw the church into a cold sweat. The very, very good ones who attend church and say their prayers and spend all their time reading the Bible may be very dear to the minister and be very sure of heaven, but will never help on the world's progress one iota.

And this brings me to the statement that he who works in the interest of the church will never do anything to elevate his race. He cannot be a Christian and at the same time help on the world's progress, any more than a man can advance and go backward at the same time. The Bible is a millstone to the neck of civilization, and no man can be a Christian who disbelieves it; and those who do believe it are rarely scientifically inclined.

The word "science" has a broader signification than some are willing to allow. The discovery of facts and their application to the wants of man, and deductions made from such facts, hav been the main factors in elevating the race.

A pile of stones is not a house; but when they are placed in position by the hand of the architect they become a house. And facts become science when properly arranged by the scientific architect. And so every fact bears a certain relation to some science known or unknown.

The greater the number we hav to discover facts, and utilize them and draw deductions from them, the more rapid will be the advancement of the race. All will see that the more ardent and sincere the Christian is the less his mind will be turned to such subjects. A man upon his knees is never in search of scientific facts. A man who is constantly poring over his Bible is constantly thinking of God and saviors and heaven and hell, but cannot be much interested in anything which will materially benefit the race. Every devout Christian is one taken from the army of truth seekers, and will oppose with might and main the true philanthropist.

I do not complain so much of the Christian trying to put objects in the way of progress; but it is a sort of back-action influence which has a tendency to neutralize the best efforts of the progressionists. It is like tying a corpse to a living body, to be dragged after him as he proceeds.

Now, sufficient has been said to show that the sooner we can break up all confidence in the Bible as an inspired work the sooner we can transform these corpses into living men, and turn them into helpers instead of dragging them as dead weight. It is even worse than a drag, for they absolutely pull in the opposit direction. Oh, it is a sorry thought that some of the best minds of the nineteenth century should be monopolized in rendering nugatory the influence of an old book conceived in ignorance and born of selfishness, and which for thousands of years has had no other effect than to enslave the many at the bidding of a pampered few!

Every Christian is mentally and morally working against the progressiv spirit of the age. Instead of taking men of high intelligence and moral standing of to-day as patterns worthy of imitation, the young are taught that the brutal specimens of humanity of three thousand years ago were more perfect, and that the social rottenness of the olden time is preferable to the condition of society of the present day. No thanks to the church or to Christianity for the happy change.

To expose old errors oftentimes paves the way to new truths. Thomas Paine rendered a great service to this country by exposing the venality and corruption of the British government. There were thousands who would not hav espoused the cause of the colonists if they had not been led to see the corruption of the government of the mother country. So it seems to be necessary to expose the rottenness and incongruity of old theological notions before we can successfully introduce the new truth and the better thought and the better way.

These considerations hav induced me partially to go over the ground, and show the brutality, incongruity, vulgarity, lustfulness, and obscenity of an old book which millions believe to be sacred, and which has impeded human progress for hundreds of generations.

I enter upon this task, not because it is a pleasure to me, but with the same motiv which would induce a man to abate a nuisance. I oppose Christianity because I firmly believe it to be the foe of civilization and detrimental to the best interests of the race.

It is believed by some that China has a sufficient number of inhabitants to flood this country and produce, if unrestrained, a moral and political revolution. I ask anyone to think what the consequence might be if two hundred millions of Chinamen should be allowed to mingle with our people. Such an ignorant element would tend to lower the standard of civilization, and the nation might never recover from its blighting effects. I oppose Christianity just as I would oppose the introduction of such an element among our people, and for the same reason, viz., its blighting effects.

Long after all confidence in the Bible as an inspired work will be lost, its supposed author, the Christian's God, will remain. The last battle in freedom's struggle will be to show that the Christian's God is a myth.

To the Christian there are no laws of nature; God does everything. Nothing can be done unless God has a hand in it. As long as people can be made to believe that God does everything, they will never study the laws of nature. Ask the devotee about any operation of nature, and his answer is, God does it. With a bleared vision he sees a God in all the works of nature. Here investigation ceases. If a huge rock be loosened from the mountain top, it comes bounding and crashing into the valley. The Christian sees nothing but the hand of God to move the rock, but science declares that God could not prevent it.

A mountain of ice breaks loose from some promontory and plunges into the ocean. It is driven hither and thither by wind and ocean-current, and all the time the water is eating away its base. Finally, its center of gravity is changed, and it capsizes. It takes a long time to effect this change, but when the time comes it turns over in a moment. The same law which forces the rock down the mountain side, causes the iceberg to tumble in the ocean. There is no God concerned in these operations at all—nothing but cause and effect.

So some scientists believe that vast fields of ice accumulate unequally in the polar regions for thousands of years, until the earth's center of gravity is changed, and then it suddenly lurches, so to speak, and the axial direction of the poles is changed. Thus the zones might be changed, and the torrid become the temperate, or vice versa.

The mind can scarcely conceive a more awful change, or one on a more tremendous scale. Yet some scientific minds believe that such changes hav taken place. But there was no God in it, more than in the case of the iceberg—simply cause and effect.

It is believed that the great desert of Sahara can be rendered fertil, and that fertil fields and trees and flowers can be made to cover the desert waste. This would indeed seem like a new creation, but God would hav no more to do with it than he would with digging a ditch or planting an apple-tree. For it is simply by ditching and tree-planting that it is proposed to reclaim the desert.

It is by studying the laws of nature that we are enabled to harness wind and steam, and make the very elements the servants of man. The great advantages derived from wind and water, steam and electricity, hav had more to do with elevating the race than all the gods that ever made fools of men. Every man who utilizes a force of nature does more to civilize the race than all the gospel-bangers that ever sniveled over a crucified savior.

The Elgin Sunday-Law Convention.

From the American Sentinel, Oakland, Cal.

The Elgin Sunday-Law Convention was held the 8th of last November in the Baptist church, Elgin, Ill. It was "called by the members of the Elgin Association of Congregational Ministers and Churches to consider the prevalent desecration of the Sabbath, and its remedy." . . . The convention passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we recognize the Sabbath as an institution of God, revealed in nature and the Bible, and of perpetual obligation on all men; and also as a civil and American institution, bound up in vital and historical connection with the origin and foundation of our government, the growth of our polity, and necessary to be maintained in order for the preservation and integrity of our national system, and therefore as having a sacred claim on all patriotic American citizens.

Resolved, That we look with shame and sorrow on the non-observance of the Sabbath by many Christian people, in that the custom prevails with them of purchasing Sabbath newspapers, engaging in and patronizing Sabbath business and travel, and in many instances giving themselvs to pleasure and self-indulgence, setting aside by neglect and indifference the great duties and privileges which God's day brings them.

2. That we giv our votes and support to those candidates or political officers who will pledge themselvs to vote for the enactment and enforcing of statutes in favor of the civil Sabbath.

3 That we giv our patronage to such business men, manufacturers, and laborers as observe the Sabbath.

4. That we favor a permanent Sabbath organization for the state of Illinois; the object of which shall be the creation of public sentiment and to secure the enactment and enforcement of necessary laws for the protection of the Sabbath.

5. That we favor the organization of auxiliary societies to accomplish the above object.

6. That four committees be appointed by this convention, consisting of two persons each, a minister and a layman; one committee to carefully and accurately investigate and report to the next convention all the facts obtainable concerning Sunday business; one to investigate and report similarly concerning Sunday newspapers; one concerning Sunday pleasuring; one concerning Sunday transportation and travel.

Resolved, That this association authorizes the executiv committee to request railway corporations and newspapers to discontinue the running of Sunday trains and the publication of Sunday editions of their papers.

Notice, the Sabbath is here set forth as an institution of God, and also as a "civil institution." It is for "candidates or political officers who will pledge themselvs to vote for the enactment and enforcement of statutes in favor of the civil Sabbath" that they will vote.

Now we shall present some of the arguments upon which they base this demand for laws in favor of the "civil Sabbath," and also showing what they want these laws enforced for.

Rev. Henry Wilson said:

The industries of the world should be silent one day in seven, that the toiler may hear the invitation of the master, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will giv you rest," and that the spiritual temple of God may be built without the noise of the hammer.

Exactly. The state must compel everybody to keep Sunday, "that the toiler may hear the invitation of the master," and "that the spiritual temple of God may be built." And then they will call that a civil statute! If such a statute as that would be a civil one, what would be required to make a religious statute? But suppose the toiler should then refuse to go to hear that invitation; what then? Will the state compel him to go? If not, why not? The state compels him to keep Sunday that he may hear the invitation; now is the state to allow its good offices to be set at naught and its purposes frustrated by the toiler's refusing to hear the invitation? And the church having gained the recognition of the state to that extent, is she going to stop short of her object? Other quotations will answer these questions.

Dr. W. W. Everts, of Chicago, said:

This day is set apart for divine worship and preparation for another life. It is the test of all religion. The people who do not keep the Sabbath hav no religion.

Is it then the province of the state to pass and enforce statutes in the interests of divine worship? Is it in the nature of a civil statute to prepare men for another life? "It is the test of all religion," says the doctor. Then what is the enforcement of the Sabbath but the enforcement of a religious test? And what is the application of it to "candidates and political officers" but the application of a religious test? And what is that but an open violation of the Constitution of the United States, which says, "No religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States?" It is true that, under the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, this provision of the Constitution does not prohibit the application of any religious test as a qualification to any office under any state. And if there be no such provision as this in the state constitution, these preachers of Illinois, and of all the other states, can go ahead unrestrained in the application of their religious test to all the candidates for state offices. But there is one thing certain, and that is, Sunday being "the test of all religion," no Sunday law test can ever be applied to any candidate for the House of Representativs, for the Senate, or for any other office or public trust under the United States, without a direct violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Further, says the doctor, "The people who do not keep the Sabbath hav no religion." The antithesis of this is likewise true. The people who do keep the Sabbath hav religion. Therefore this demand for laws to compel people to keep the Sabbath is a demand for laws to compel people to be religious. And yet they hav the face to call it "the civil Sabbath."

Again, Dr. Everts says:

He who does not keep the Sabbath does not worship God, and he who does not worship God is lost.

Perfectly true, doctor. The antithesis of this also is true. He who does keep the Sabbath, does worship God. Therefore your demand for laws to compel men to keep the Sabbath is a demand for laws to compel them to worship God. And that is only to introduce the system of papacy and of the Inquisition. There is no use for you to deny that you want laws to compel the observance of the Sabbath, and that, too, with the idea of worship, because in the very next sentence you say:

The laboring class are apt to rise late on Sunday morning, read the Sunday papers, and allow the hour of worship to go by unheeded.

Here are the steps plainly to be taken as surely as these ambitious clerics ever get the slightest recognition of their Sunday law demands: First, a law compelling all labor to cease on Sunday. Then the laboring class will read the Sunday papers, and so allow the hour of worship to go by unheeded, consequently there must be, secondly, a law abolishing all Sunday papers. But suppose then these people take to reading books, and let the hour of worship go by unheeded, then, logically, there must be, thirdly, a law abolishing all reading of books on Sunday. But suppose they let the hour of worship go by unheeded, anyhow, then, logically, there must be, fourthly, a law compelling them not to let the hour of worship pass by unheeded. Having secured themselvs in the first two of these steps, what is to hinder these divines from taking the other two, which just as logically follow as the second follows the first? There is just nothing at all to hinder them. Well, then, having taken the first two, will they not take the other two? Anybody who thinks they will not has studied human nature and read history to very little purpose. And anybody who thinks they do not intend to take the other steps has read the Sunday-law propositions to very little purpose. Prof. Samuel Ives Curtis said in this convention: "We are not commanded to remember the Sabbath as a day of rest and recreation, but to 'keep it holy.'" And last spring, in the Boston Monday Lectureship, Joseph Cook said:

The experience of centuries shows that you will in vain endeavor to preserve Sunday as a day of rest, unless you preserve it as a DAY OF WORSHIP.

There, that ought to be plain enough to make anybody understand what is the purpose of the demand for "civil" Sunday laws. The only safety is in never allowing them to secure themselvs in the first step—that is, in never allowing them to secure any sort of a Sunday law. For just as soon as the so-called Protestant churches in this land become possessed of power to wield the civil power in the interests of religion, we shall hav the papacy over again.

But Dr. Everts continues; it is not enough that Sunday papers must be stopped in behalf of the churches, but Sunday trains must also be stopped, and for the same reason. He says:

The Sunday train is another great evil. They cannot afford to run a train unless they get a great many passengers, and so break up a great many congregations. The Sunday railroad trains are hurrying their passengers fast on to perdition. What an outrage that the railroad, that great civilizer, should destroy the Christian Sabbath!

Oh, yes! The church-members and the church-goers will go on Sunday trains and Sunday excursions, etc. Therefore the trains are responsible and are hurrying their passengers on to perdition. Therefore by all means stop the Sunday trains, so as to keep these excellent church-members out of perdition, for if they hav any chance they will go. Shut up the way to perdition, and then they will go to heaven. They havn't enough religion nor love of right to do right, therefore they must hav the state to take away all opportunity to do wrong. And these people will boast themselvs of their religion and their being Christians! It is difficult to see how a Sunday train can hurry anybody to perdition who does not ride on it. And if these church-members are hurried to perdition by Sunday trains, who is to blame? Right here lies the secret of the whole evil—they blame everybody and everything else, even to inanimate things, for the irreligion, the infidelity, and the sin that lies in their own hearts.

The following statements, made by Dr. Mandeville in the convention, are literally true in a good deal deeper sense than he intended:

1. There has been an alliance formed between the church and the world.

That is a fact, and it is going to ruin both.

2. Let us not deny it.

Amen. We earnestly hope you will not. There is no use in trying to deny it. But, instead of going about in the right way to remedy the evil, you set on foot a scheme to compel the world to act as though it were religious, and so to bind closer the alliance and increase the evil.

3. Influential men fasten themselvs upon the church—a sort of political Christians.

Most decidedly true. And the most "influential" of these "political Christians" and the most of them are found in the pulpit; and they organize conventions and pass resolutions to giv their "votes and support to those candidates or political officers who will pledge themselvs to vote for the enactment and enforcing of statutes in favor of the civil Sabbath" "as a day of worship."

4. Too many men are in the church for self-profit.

Indeed there are—a vast number too many.

5. We pastors are to blame for allowing them to rule.

Yes; you are. You are especially to blame for those influential political Christians fastening themselvs upon the church and ruling it, and trading off its votes through Sunday-law conventions. The churches themselvs, however, are not clear of blame in this. They ought to rise up and turn out the whole company of these political Christians, and fill their pulpits with such Christians as care more for the love of Christ and the power of the holy spirit than they do for votes and the power of civil government.

But the following statements by the same gentleman we not suppose hav any deeper meaning than he intends:

1. The subject has two sides. We must not look alone at the religious side. The interests of church and state are united.

And yet you are all opposed to a union of church and state, aren't you?

2. The merchants of Tyre insisted upon selling goods near the temple on the Sabbath, and Nehemiah compelled the officers of the law to do their duty and stop it. So we can compel the officers of the law to do their duty. . . . When the church of God awakes and does it duty on one side, and the state on the other, we shall hav no further trouble in this matter.

Yes, we remember how it was before. The gentle Albigenses in the south of France greatly disturbed the church. They refused to obey its commands. But the church was wide awake, for Innocent III. was pope; and he awoke the state with the call, "Up, most Christian king, up, and aid us in our work of vengeance!" And thus with the church awake to its duty on one side, and the state on the other, the Albigenses were swept from the earth, and there was no further trouble in that matter. Woe, woe to the day, and thrice woe to the people, when the religious power can compel the civil. And that is precisely what this Elgin Sunday-law Convention proposes to do.

It would seem from Dr. Mandeville's citation of the example of Nehemiah that they intend to set up a theocracy here. If not, there is no force in his argument from that instance. But from the following it is quite certain that that is what they hav in view. Prof. C. A. Blanchard said:

In this work we are undertaking for the Sabbath we are representativs of the Lord God.

Therefore it follows that when they vote to support those candidates and political officers who will pledge themselvs, etc., they will vote as the representativs of God. And if any of themselvs should secure votes enough to send them to the legislature or to Congress, they would go there and legislate as representativs of God. And when they get into their hands the power to enforce the law, and to compel the civil power to do their bidding, they will do it all as the representativs of God. And thus again it is demonstrated that if these influential "political Christians" once get the Sunday laws for which they are so diligently working, we shall hav in this nation a living image of the papacy. And again we say the only safety is not letting them secure the enactment of any sort of a Sunday law, nor anything else through which they may dominate the civil power.

And we will say, we hav not selected all these quotations about the religious Sabbath, and left out what was said about the civil Sabbath. We hav carefully read the whole report, and we state it as the literal truth that, outside of the resolutions, there is not in all the report a single sentence about a civil Sabbath. It is all religious, and that only. And yet, just like the California Sunday-law Convention, when it came to putting the thing in form to get votes and legislation they deftly insert the word "civil." All this goes to show what we hav often stated, that there is no such thing as a civil Sabbath; and it shows that these men do not really intend to secure, nor to enforce, a "civil" Sunday law, but a religious one wholly.

Courtlandt Palmer Gone.

The news comes just as we go to press of the death of Courtlandt Palmer, on the 22d inst., at Lake Dunmore, Vermont, whither he had gone in hopes to amend the health that has for many years been precarious. The news will be sad for his personal friends and for thousands of Freethinkers throughout the country.

Mr. Palmer was best known through his sympathy with Radicalism, both of politics and religion. In the former he was a Socialist; in the latter, an Agnostic, or Atheist of the Comteian school. Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will well remember the strong stand he took along with James Parton and other literary Freethinkers in behalf of D. M. Bennett and against the ecclesiastical society which secured Mr. Bennett's incarceration in prison. Mr. Palmer was for several years the treasurer of the National Liberal League, and its treasury as well, for when Man was published it was his purse that oftenest paid the bills. He was for two years also treasurer of the American Secular Union, and a large contributor to its funds. A year ago last fall he succeeded Colonel Ingersoll as its president.

Mr. Palmer was born in this city, March 25, 1843, and was a member of the old Stonington family of Palmers. His mother was a daughter of Richard Suydam, one of the old Knickerbockers. He was educated at Columbia and Williams colleges, and the Columbia Law School. He was brought up in the Dutch Reformed church, but as a youth became a Freethinker. He was one of the most conspicuous figures in the city's social literary life, and was known as a man of intense earnestness of conviction and one that felt himself convinced that he had a mission in life. This he conceived to be the preaching and practice of the Religion of Humanity, as the disciples of Fourier and Comte, of whom Palmer was an ardent follower, called the doctrins of their masters. Possessed of a large fortune, he devoted a large part of his means to the spreading of these doctrins. The amelioration of the condition of working people was also a subject near to his heart, and he was ever ready to devise plans or enter upon schemes devised by others looking to this end.

Of late years Mr. Palmer has done most of his work for Freethought through the Nineteenth Century Club. Through this Club he made heresy fashionable in New York, and injected ideas into the heads of many who otherwise would hav wandered idealess through life. The Club gradually attracted men of brain, both heterodox and orthodox, and became one of the institutions of the city. Mr. Palmer aimed to provide in the Nineteenth Century Club a forum where prominent men of the most antagonistic beliefs could be persuaded to meet and exchange views, and on its platform such men as Colonel Ingersoll, Howard Crosby, Andrew Carnegie, Frederick R. Coudert, T. B. Wakeman, Monsignor Preston, and others equally prominent hav given their thoughts to large audiences. The most notable recent meeting was the debate between Colonel Ingersoll, Agnostic; Frederick R. Coudert, Roman Catholic; and Stewart L. Woodford, Protestant. About a year ago Andrew Carnegie, Judge Barrett, and a few conservativ ministers resigned from the Club because of Mr. Palmer's radical utterances and denunciation of the trial of the Chicago alleged Anarchists. Last fall Mr. Palmer visited England and endeavored to establish in London a branch of this Club. He returned to this city in May, but left shortly for Lake Dunmore by advice of his physician.

As a man Mr. Palmer was courteous, genial, and generous. Born and reared in a circle the tendency of which is to repress every radical thought and make its members self-conceitedly conservativ, he nevertheless threw off its influence and became a man. His heart and brain were too big to be circumscribed by any set or sect. He had the courage to proclaim his thought, and his wealth and influence commanded a hearing. Mentally he was with the most radical wing of the Freethinkers; socially, he lived with the conservativs, to whom through the Nineteenth Century Club he was a sort of missionary, teaching them new ideas and disclosing to them views of a new mental world. We doubt if the Nineteenth Century Club will survive the loss of its founder and president, or if it does, it will probably drift toward orthodoxy and intellectual death.

For his services and sympathy to D. M. Bennett, as well as for many subsequent kind acts, THE TRUTH SEEKER has reason to mourn Mr. Palmer's death. Organized Freethought has in him also lost a great deal. The radicals in politics and social economy hav likewise suffered through his death. In fact, all reforms will mourn a champion stout of heart, able of brain, and practical of resource as well as generous of purse. To his grave in the ground made dear to us by the burial of the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we bring the tribute of love for his worth, respect for his bravery, and admiration of his ability. The world would hav been better off had he not died so soon.

Christianity and Slavery.

Christianity, says Mr. Gladstone, abolished slavery. The statement is repeated by Leo XIII., and by him heralded everywhere in a special encyclical, affirming his late procuring of abolition in Brazil and noising his present solicitations to governments to coöperate in suppressing slavedealing.

Before attending to the direct facts which shall prove or disprove, what would be the à priori judgment of an intelligent student of history, the probable deduction from general principles? Two cardinal principles of conduct of the Christian church hav always been, first, to attach itself to and appropriate the credit of every progressiv movement seen destined to be successful; and second, to justify by scripture and defend as divinely taught any institution, however vile and monstrous, that suits its members of influence and cash. Are these the two principles upon which it has acted in the present case? Precisely.

At the time of the rise of Christianity, a strong movement toward emancipation was under way. It had existed and increased from the days of Nero. Seneca forwarded the movement unceasingly. Enactments by Nero, Claudius, Antonine, and Adrian raised the position of the slave continuously. The institution began to suffer more and more from the opposition of the northern barbarians who descended and mingled with the Romans, modifying or destroying it wherever they obtained domination. Finally, private manumission became so frequent that it was found necessary to impose regulativ checks by law to secure a more gradual social adjustment of the swarms of freedmen. It was at this time that Christianity "inaugurated emancipation!" It is for the inexpressible favor of stepping in at such a moment, fastening her ceremonies upon the acts of manumission and appropriating the credit, and with a keen eye to business, building up a vast monastery system with the liberated, that the church now asks praise and adoration. If Christians ask for the evidence of all this, it is plentiful enough; refer them to Grotius (De Jure, lib. iii., chap. 14) and to every trusted historian.

Here is falseness enough, here is baseness enough, hypocrisy, duplicity, knavery enough already to damn the church's record. Yet this is as nothing. This is but the beginning. Let us see what came next. Presently the heads of monasteries began to find serf labor more profitable than free. Does any student need to be told the effect of this self-interest? The desire for emancipation suddenly fell away. Bondage flourished as never before. Great numbers of free peasants were absorbed. The Abbot Alcuin had twenty thousand serfs attached forever to the soil. Before the church had the bondmen, she industriously sermonized secular authorities on the evil; as soon as she got them, it took every civil influence that could be brought to bear on her to compel her to giv them up. "The clergy," says Hallam in his History of the Middle Ages, "inveighed against the scandal of keeping Christians in bondage, but they were not, it is said, so ready in performing their own parts. The villeins upon the church lands were among the last who were emancipated." Slavery lingered till the thirteenth century; serfdom, to the eighteenth.

Is the measure of hypocrisy and iniquity sufficiently full? No; we hav but commenced to see how Christianity "abolished slavery." The church taught that all non-Christians might be enslaved without scruple. This is what preachers call cherishing "the brotherhood of man." Jews and Mohammedans were enslaved at every opportunity. They naturally retaliated, and the slave system received an impetus that extended and strengthened it through the most remote lands.

The next step taken by Christianity toward abolishing slavery consisted in inculcating, when the New World was discovered and ravaged by bloody Spanish warriors and priests with every circumstance of torture and ferocity, that as American nativs were not descended from Adam, they had no souls, and might be enslaved, murdered, or treated as animals in any way one pleased. Now Brazil is expected to be grateful. Christian authority enslaved the nativs, and now when a growing Rationalism tears from their bloody throats her ferocious gripe, she asks for gratitude.

We hav now seen the course of Christianity in regard to slavery up to the latest two or three centuries. How beautiful has been its manipulation of the two rules of conduct indicated at the beginning of this article! How simple! Also, how simple are the dupes to be deceived by it!

How truthful the statement of Gladstone and Leo!

We hav more to see.

But a few generations back, in the hight of ecclesiastical rule, the Christian nations of the earth inaugurated in their own bosoms a slave trade and slave servitude so infamous that beside it the system of the ancients is one of humanity and glory. In the ancient states the slaves formed an intelligent and happy class of society. A prospect of manumission was held out to all, and manumission of old slaves was very general. They produced all the articles of refinement and luxury, conducted the most difficult forms of labor, and often exercised the most important professions. Their minds were frequently cultivated to the highest degree, and their social privileges were proportioned to their virtue and talent. Our slave-owners seized their poor victims amid bloody carnage, dragged them to the coast and across the seas in reeking slave-ships with a cruelty that caused the death of fifty-nine per cent before landing, and brutalized the survivors by a system of enforced ignorance that made it a penal offense to teach a slave to read. "The modern slave trade," writes Lecky the historian, "was an atrocity unknown to the ancients." That is, the slave trade of Christians was an atrocity unknown to pagans.

Let us consider with a still closer analysis what the modern slave system was. It was adultery:

"With the consent of their masters, slaves may marry, and their moral power to agree to such a contract or connection as that of marriage cannot be doubted; but whilst a state of slavery, it cannot produce any civil ct, because slaves are 'deprived of all civil rights'" (Judge Matthews of Louisiana; Martin's Rep., VI, 550).

The Savannah River Association, in 1835, in reply to the question, "Whether, in a case of involuntary separation, of such a character as to preclude all prospect of future intercourse, the parties ought to be allowed to marry again?" answered:

"That such a separation, among persons situated as our slaves are, is civilly a separation by death, and they believe that, in the sight of God, it would be so viewed. To forbid second marriages in such cases would be to expose the parties, not only to stronger hardships and strong temptation, but to church censure, for acting in disobedience to their masters, who cannot be expected to acquiesce in a regulation at variance with justice to the slaves, and to the spirit of that command which regulates marriage among Christians. The slaves are not free agents, and a dissolution by death is not more entirely without their consent, and beyond their control, than by such separation."

At the Shiloh Baptist Association the following query was presented from Hedgman church:

"Is a servant, whose husband or wife has been sold by his or her master into a distant country, to be permitted to marry again?"

The query was referred to a committee, who made the following report, which, after discussion, was adopted:

"That in view of the circumstances in which servants in this country are placed, the committee are unanimous in the opinion that it is better to permit servants thus circumstanced to take another husband or wife."

The Carolina Baptist had an article headed, "Slavery and Matrimony." An extract is submitted:

"As the state constitutionally and legally is ignorant of the marriage of slaves, it is equally ignorant of its dissolution. It leaves this whole matter where it ought to be, that is, untouched, and with the owners themselvs."

If the church permitted and indorsed this, it permitted and indorsed adultery.

Modern slavery was murder:

"STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, LENOIR COUNTY.

"Whereas, complaint hath been this day made to us, two of the justices of the peace for the said county, by William D. Cobb, of Jones county, that two negro slaves belonging to him, named Ben (commonly known by the name of Ben Fox) and Rigdon, hav absented themselvs from their said master's service, and are lurking about in the counties of Lenoir and Jones, committing acts of felony—these are, in the name of the state, to command the said slaves forthwith to surrender themselvs, and return home to their said master. And we do hereby, by virtue of an act of the assembly of this state, concerning servants and slaves, intimate and declare, if the said slaves do not surrender themselvs, and return home to their master immediately after the publication of these presents, that any person may kill and destroy said slaves by such means as he or they think fit, without accusation or impeachment of auy crime or offense for so doing, or without incurring any penalty or forfeiture thereby.

"Given under our hands and seals, this 12th day of Nov., 1836. "B. COLEMAN, J. P. [Seal.]

"JAS. JONES, J. P. [Seal.]"

"TWO HUNDRED DOLLARS REWARD.—Ran away from the subscriber, a certain negro man named Ben, commonly known by the name of Ben Fox. Also one other negro, by the name of Rigdon, who ran away on the 8th of this month.

"I will giv the reward of oue hundred dollars for each of the above negroes, to be delivered to me or confined in the jail of Lenoir or Jones county, or for the killing of them, so that I can see them. W. D. COBB.

"November 12, 1836."

"RAN AWAY, MY NEGRO MAN RICHARD.—A reward of $25 will be paid for his apprehension, dead or alive. Satisfactory proof will only be required of his being killed. He has with him, in all probability, his wife Eliza, who ran away from Colonel Thompson, now a resident of Alabama, about the time he commenced his journey to that state.

"D. H. RHODES."

"ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY DOLLARS REWARD.—Ran away from my plantation on the 6th inst., three negro men, all of dark complexion.

"The above reward will be paid to anyone who will kill the three, or fifty for either one, or twenty dollars apiece for them delivered to me at my plantation alive, on Chattahoochie, Early county. J. MCDONALD."

If the church permitted and indorsed this, it permitted and indorsed murder.

Did it indorse it? We said at the beginning of this article that the church invariably defends as divine any institution useful to its wealthy members, justifying it with texts culled from the Bible—culled from that heterogeneous collection of maxims of which "age cannot wither or custom stale the infinit variety." Let us see.

The Harmony presbytery of South Carolina resolved "That slavery has existed from the days of those good old slaveholders and patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who are now in the kingdom of heaven, to the time when the apostle Paul sent a runaway home to his master Philemon, and wrote a Christian and fraternal letter to this slaveholder, which we find still stands in the canon of the scriptures, and slavery has existed ever since the days of the apostles," and the church has no right to affect it.

The Rev. Wm. S. Plummer, D.D., high in the Presbyterian church, declared the Abolition movement "the most meddlesome, impudent, reckless, fierce, and wicked excitement ever seen," and said Abolitionists were like Infidels and should be lynched.

The Rev. Bishop Meade, Episcopal, in a book of sermons to slaves addressed them in this wise:

"Almighty God hath been pleased to make you slaves here, and to giv you nothing but labor and poverty in this world, which you are obliged to submit to, as it is his will that it should be so. One general rule you ought always to carry in your minds, and that is, to do all service for them as if you did it for God himself."

The Rev. J. C. Postell maintained:

"1. That slavery is a judicial visitation. 2. That it is not a moral evil. 3. That it is supported by the Bible—that it is by divine appointment."

In 1816 the Presbyterian church, having among its articles one censuring slavery, in obedience to the wishes of its influential members convened in general assembly and expunged it.

The Rev. Dr. Wisner, Presbyterian, declared:

"I will spend my few remaining days in solitude, and go down to my grave friendless and alone, rather than violate my ordination vows, and go with my Abolition brethren in defiance of the plain precepts of our savior and his apostles."

Dr. Beecher, of Boston, opposed Abolition with the declaration: "Master and slaves existed in the primitiv churches, and it was allowed by Christ and his apostles."

A local association of Congregationalists sent a remonstrance against the custom of slaveholding by church-members to a presbytery of that church. As soon as its contents were known, the presbytery voted unanimously not to receive it.

In 1841 the Baptist national missionary organization met, and a slaveholder presided, another performed the devotions, and a third preached the sermon. Rev. Elon Galusha was removed from the board of managers for being a friend of the enslaved, and a slaveholder filled his place. A member wrote to the Biblical Recorder: "Our meeting was truly delightful. The spirit of the gospel prevailed, and gav a tremendous shock to the Abolitionists."

Rev. Dr. Wayland, president of Brown University, Providence, R. I., argued that "slavery is not always and everywhere a sin." In a letter congratulating a friend on his successful apology for the system, he said: "Never before, I presume, has the defense of slavery, on Christian principles, been so ably conducted."

In 1841, Rev. Jonathan Davis, a Baptist clergyman from Georgia, visited the Northern states. Boasting that he was the owner of thirty human beings, and that he would wade kneedeep in blood to defend his right to hold them, he was everywhere received by the Northern Baptists and many other churches with delight. In a letter dated Boston, May 23, 1841, he says:

"It is proper for me to state that the mass of our brethren, both in Philadelphia and New York, are opposed to Abolition."

And in one dated Philadelphia, June 22, 1841:

"I hav now met all the able debaters and lecturers in New England and New York, except one Gerritt Smith, of whom I hav heard much. He was sent for to meet me, but did not come. Whether it was for fear he would share the fate of the others, I cannot tell. I am now on my way home, leaving the hot-beds of Abolitionism without having been once foiled. God be praised for sustaining me."

In 1836, the Methodist Episcopal church reversed its antislavery declarations of 1785 and 1801, censured two members for lecturing on Abolitionism, and declared itself opposed to emancipation.

In 1836, Rev. George W. Freeman delivered two sermons on "The Rights and Duties of Slaveholders," which were published with the commendation of his Protestant Episcopal bishop. An extract reads thus:

"No man or set of men in our day, unless they can produce a new revelation from heaven, are entitled to pronounce slavery wrong. . . . Slavery, as it exists at the present day, is agreeable to the order of divine providence."

In South Carolina, the Society for the Advancement of Christianity, composed of clergymen and elders, published the above sermons as a religious tract, for gratuitous distribution.

The Protestant Episcopal church was candid enough to discard the half-way measures of some churches and openly avow pro-slavery principles. It made no pretension to any other character.

The position of the Campbellites may be gathered from the words of President Shannon, of Bacon College, a leader of that sect, in conclusion of a Bible pro-slavery argument:

"Thus did Jehovah stereotype his approbation of domestic slavery by incorporating it with the institutions of the Jewish religion, the only religion on earth that had the divine sanction."

The Rev. Alex. Campbell, from whom this church derives its name, wrote in the Millennial Harbinger for April, 1845:

"Is the simple relation of master and slave necessarily and essentially immoral and unchristian? We are clearly and satisfactorily convinced it is not."

In May of the same year:

"There is not one verse in the Bible inhibiting it, but many regulating it. It is not, then, we conclude, immoral. . . . The New Testament does not authorize any interference or legislation upon the relation of master and slave. While it prescribes the duty of both parties, master and slaves, it sanctions the relation."

The Hamden Sydney College and Union Theological Seminary, Prince Edward county, Va., held slaves enough to pay the pastor of the college church his salary, so that not a cent of it need be paid by the church-members.

In 1833 the Rev. Dr. Furman, of North Carolina, addressed to the governor of that state a lengthy communication expressing the sentiments of the Baptist church and clergy on slavery. Its substance is contained in this extract:

"The right of holding slaves is clearly established in the holy scriptures, both by precept and example."

When this Christian clergyman died, the notice of the sale of his effects contained these two items, in juxtaposition:

"A library of miscellaneous character, chiefly theological. Twenty-seven negroes, some of them very prime."

One item of an advertisment in the Savannah, Ga., Republican of March 13, 1845:

"Also, at the same time and place, the following negro slaves, to wit: Charles, Peggy, Antonnett, Davy, September, Maria, Jenny, and Isaac—levied on as the property of Henry T. Hall, to satisfy a mortgage fi. fia., issued out of McIntosh superior court, in favor of the board of directors of the Theological Seminary of the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia, vs. said Henry T. Hall. Conditions, cash.

"C. O'NEAL, Deputy Sheriff."

The Rev. Albert Barnes, one of the most eminent members the Presbyterian church has ever had, said in a sermon at Philadelphia:

"Advert for a moment to the efforts made to remove slavery from the world, and to the hindrances which exist to all efforts which can be made to remove it in consequence of the relation of the church to the system. Reflect how many members of the Christian church, and how many ministers of the gospel are owners of slaves; how little effort is made by the great mass to dissociate themselvs from the system; how many there are, even in the pulpit, who openly advocate it; how much identified the system is with all the plans of gain, and all the views of the comforts and ease of domestic life among mauy members of the church; and how faint and feeble is the voice of condemnation of the system uttered by the great mass, even of those who hav no connection with it; and how often the language of apology is heard even then, and it is easy to see how ineffectual must be all efforts to remove this great evil from the world. The language of the ministry and the practice of church-members giv such a sanction to this enormous evil as could be derived from no other source, and such as it is useless to attempt to convince the world of the evil. Against all this influence in the church in favor of the system, how hopeless are all attempts against it."

Rev. Robert J. Breckenridge, of Baltimore, an eminent Presbyterian, said:

"The church has cherished slavery in her bosom and sustained it by her example."

Dr. Nelson, afterward president of the Literary and Theological Institution in Illinois, wrote:

"Of all Northern periodicals, the New York Observer must hav the preference as an efficient support of slavery. I am not sure but it does more than all things combined to keep the dreadful system alive. It is just the succor demanded by the South. . . . Indeed, I never heard a sermon to slaves hut what made obedience to masters by the slaves the fundamental and supreme law of religion."

Professor Stuart, of Andover Theological Seminary, wrote to President Fisk, of Middletown Theological Seminary, that "slavery may exist without violating the Christian faith or the church." President Fisk replied: "This doctrin will stand, because it is Bible doctrin."

Rev. J. C. Postell, of South Carolina, exhorted the citizens of Orangeburg and vicinity at a crowded meeting:

"Shun Abolitionism as you would the devil. Do your duty as citizens and Christians, and in heaven you will be rewarded and delivered from Abolitionism."

"Only the religious sanctions of the church," wrote Parker Pillsbury, the Abolitionist agitator, in 1846, "prevent Abolition's immediate success." In testimony to the obstruction of the church, Pillsbury, Phillips, Garrison, Lucy Colman, Abbey Kelley Foster, every one of the famous Abolition leaders, hav been unanimous.

We hav now reviewed the whole course of Christianity in relation to slavery. We hav seen the spirit and nature of the church. Creation groans beneath this monstrous system of cruelty, hypocrisy, and fraud.

Letters from Friends.

ALMIRA, TEX., June 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Colonel Ingersoll's "Defense of Reynolds." My time expired June 1st, but I can't well do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope to send you some subscribers this fall.

J. P. MILLS.

ROCHESTER, N. H., July 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read your paper for nearly two years, and will say that it has made me a wiser if not a better man; and am of the opinion that your paper will hav the same effect on any man who has a spark of liberty in him if he will do as I hav done.

S. W. BROCK.

SOUTH LOWELL, ALA., July 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Let me advise every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER to get "Hard Times and the Way Out," by W. T. Brooks, M.D. For sale by E. A. Stevens, 241 Washington Boulevard, Chicago. It will pay an honest voter to read this pamphlet. Price, twenty cents, or three for fifty cents.

J. K. DEARTH.

AUDUBON, IOWA, June 26, 111 I.U.S.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago I sent and got a sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and was very much pleased with it. So now I send you inclosed $3. I did not know the price of the "History of Christianity," but, in looking over my Freethought papers, I see the price is $2. The two will just use a five-dollar bill. So inclosed please find money-order to pay for the same. It is raining here to-day, and my soul yearneth for something sensible to read.

Yours truly, D. A. MORRISON.

RENFREW, PA., July 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish you would publish the following lines, so that some reader may let me know who is the author of them, as I hav made many inquiries and cannot learn:

If God a perfect being is, bow has he formed his plan,
To spoil with his own hands his work by making imperfect man?

If God perfect made the man, who made his imperfection?
Man could no more change himself than make the whole creation.

If God imperfect made the man, made him a fallen creature,
Where is the justice of his plan. to damn him for his nature?

THOMAS BOWSER.

CIRCLEVILLE, W. VA., June 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am a truth seeker. I believe that the Bible was written by the various religious churchmen. I am confined with rheumatism, so I cannot practice my profession. The best and most useful of papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER, has been the salvation of thousands by opening their eyes, clearing their minds, and strengthening their reason, thereby enabling them to raise themselvs from the ditch and mire of religious superstition up to the glorious dawn of the era of man.

I am a true friend to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its generous Editor.

DR. H. H. JUDY.

SOUTH ACWORTH, N. H., June 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER now about eight years, and like it just as well as ever. I shall not write, Stop my paper, just because some correspondent writes something that I don't believe, as long as you will giv me and everyone else a chance to contradict him. We miss the reports of the "man with the badge-pin." What has become of Brother Peck? I hav lent the papers that hav W. H. Burr's articles in to several Spiritualists, and they are well pleased with them. I am going to try and get some to subscribe. Please send me your catalog of books. If you will send me a number of them I will giv them to people that I think may order some books.

J. A. ALLAN.

SALISBURY, MO., June 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The following is my honest conclusion on a certain point, partly original with me and partly borrowed from Mr. Palmer's views—in short, I might say, Mr. Palmer's views enlarged upon by me:

The philanthropy of most intended benefactors has been only temporary in its effects, holding up straws to see which way the wind blew, soon passing back into the coffers of other millionaires. While if they had used their money to secure the passage of just and equitable laws for the poor, the same as the monopolist uses money to secure laws for himself, they would hav bequeathed a lasting benefit upon the poor as well as mankind in general. Let the next philanthropist weigh well these suggestions, and make his name famous by directing all his energies to that end.

JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

VERMONT, ILL., July 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: As I am now living in Vermont, Ill. (former residence, Havana, Ill.), I thought I would write a letter to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER to inform my many TRUTH SEEKER friends where they can find me if they come this way. I will further say, if any of THE TRUTH SEEKER family will come to Vermont, they will always find my door open to them or any other Liberals who come this way. My brother Lewis and I are engaged in the dry goods and grocery business here, and we are happy to say we are well pleased with the place. Since here I hav had the pleasure to talk with Mr. Paterson Harner, a true Liberal in every sense of the word. He is getting up in years, but stands firm as a rock and always ready to speak his honest thoughts. He is an old resident of this place, and one of the leading men; he is respected by all who know him. He is a great admirer of our Col. R. G. Ingersoll, and has read most of his works. If there are any true Liberals in this community who read this letter, let them come forward and grasp the hand of a fellow-worker.

J. A. WEABER,

WINDOM, KAN., June 19, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Your letter came to hand just a few minutes before we left our home to lay our dear mother to rest. She died of paralysis. She had been a consistent Methodist Episcopal for about ten years, but since I began taking THE TRUTH SEEKER two years ago, she had given up the orthodox purgatory.

Dear Editor, I am glad that I ever put on the whole armor of Freethought and subscribed for your invaluable paper. When I subscribed for your paper I knew of only three Infidels, viz., Colonel Ingersoll, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and S. Marks, a TRUTH SEEKER subscriber. Now about one-half of the people that I know are heterodox. Amen.

I think perhaps I can get up another club this fall.

Yours for heterodoxy, WILLIAM D. GILPEN.

WATERVILLE, MINN., June 18, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The reading that I ordered from you last spring came all right, and has done wonders in the community. I usually get my TRUTH SEEKER on Sunday, and by the next Sunday it has carried the glad tidings of great joy to more houses than mine. I hav no use for a binder for my paper. I do not know where one of the copies is to-day, only the one just got from the office. I think we will be able to do something in the way of getting up a club soon. I will as soon as possible send in another order for books. Those cartoons are grand. Every one is a whole book itself. I send you a new subscriber for three months, who says he will subscribe for a year at the end of that time. I also inclose some names of friends to whom you can send sample copies.

ORANGE DURAND.

FALLBROOK, CAL., June 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Along with this I mail you a paper published in San Francisco. It is not very polished, but shows very plainly and truthfully with what gigantic strides the Romish church is advancing here as well as in other parts of this country. Nor is the Protestant church lacking in efforts to grasp power, as seen in the number of Woman's Christian Temperance Unions and Young Men's Christian Associations all over the land.

These churches require but one thing more to make them paramount, and that is female suffrage, engineered by the clergy.

Liberals, are you asleep, or are you criminally supine? Will you allow the United States of America to be bound hand and foot and handed over to the enemy without making a single effort to frustrate their nefarious designs?

FREDONIA, N. Y., July 10, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I am thankful for THE TRUTH SEEKER'S never failing weekly visits to my home amidst the battle of life. It is with much effort that I can pause to read it, with the other contending duties, but when it puts in its appearance my hands involuntarily seize it, and my eyes wander over each well-filled page, of vital interest to every well-wisher of our race. On reflection the question comes back to my mind, What more needs to be said? what more can be said? Each weekly TRUTH SEEKER answers that question in full, and it is plain to see that it has put in full time and has made a week's journey's advance in thought of mental freedom on the plane of progressiv humanity—so much so that I hav not got where I can do safely without it, and here again I inclose the ever mutual needful to aid in the arduous work of opening the prison doors of ignorance and superstition.

PLINY SMITH.

LEXINGTON, MO., July 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: To Wm. A. Thompson, of St. Johns, Ill., I would say that I do not "pretend to be a Liberal," but to follow Huxley's example, hav put on a collar of my own choosing, and it is marked "Rationalist." As a follower of reason, I found nothing reasonable, nothing logical, in his column and a quarter.

Women hav no right to say when we men shall go to war. We alone do the fighting and we alone hav a right to vote, for all voting bears more or less nearly or remotely on war. By parity of reasoning, the wife alone has a right to say when she shall risk death by bringing children into the world. I say to the women whose names Mr. Thompson mentions, do what you please so it be not unlawful, but you may not please to vote me into the ranks in a war of your getting up.

Religion is not a "mental disease"— it is simply a certain state of development which some hav reached and some hav passed. So Mr. Thompson is as far wrong on that point as on some others.

As long as anyone wants to hear preaching, I still think that it is light work, well paid, and very suitable for women. The "pastoral visits" by lady pastors would especially commend themselvs to husbands and fathers—"ain't it," Mr. Thompson? The male preachers would then be at liberty to addict themselvs to some robust employment, such as a lady friend of mine suggested to one of them, to wit, "ho'in' co'n."

A good many who call themselvs "Liberals" are extremely il-Liberal, just as many who call themselvs Christians do not liv up to their professions.

Once enfranchise women and the preachers would decide all elections.

MR. EDITOR: The spirits are having quite a boom in Washington, according to the letters of Mr. and Mrs. Burr, although they say the weather is unfavorable, so much so as for Wash to contract a cold. What an idea, that a spirit could catch a cold, and be so hoarse that he could not speak above a whisper! Hav we again in spirit life to be afflicted with all the ills that flesh is heir to? And then for Wash to come out and carry away a lady's gloves! If Mrs. Burr can prove there was no deception about that, what would those gloves be worth to some enterprising showman? They would rival Barnum's mermaid. Mrs. Burr says her father materialized, and that he pinched her shoulders and spoke to her, and that she had her hands on his sides. Now, if she had held on to her father and some one had turned up the gas, would it not hav exposed a fraud? Wash came out again and said the gentleman was surprised himself, and that he never did such a thing before. Surprised at what—that he had so completely bamboozled the audience?

I would like to know where the spirits get the matter to materialize with, and what becomes of it when they disappear. Why do they not tell us something worth knowing, instead of the little claptrap stuff they say in the séance? Spiritualists tell us that the spirits can pass through any matter; then why do they not make some new discoveries? Why doesn't the spirit of the murdered victim report the author of the crime? But no; when there is anything worth communicating they are as silent as the tomb.

D. M. Bennett said before his death that if there was a future life he would let us know it, but he has not done it. Has he changed his mind, or is there not a future life?

John Peck says all that is required to perform a miracle "is a clever knave and a pack of fools!" Is there anything more wanted for a first-class séance?

MR. EDITOR: I copied the statement sent herewith from the last number of the paper entitled, The Colored Orphan and Messenger of the St. Peter Claver Society, published at Leavenworth, Kansas.

The Jesuit, F. X. Wenninger, is very well known here, but the oldest inhabitant does not know anything of the venerable old lady who was so miraculously cured. Father W. forgot to mention her name, and the street and number where she lived; so also of the St. Louis man. Will some St. Louis man please giv us the name and address of the remarkable baker?

Is this the nineteenth century?

ALMOND OWEN.

THE CANONIZATION OF PETER CLAVER.—On the 15th of January ult., our great and most gloriously reigning Pope Leo XIII. placed Peter Claver, the patron of our society, upon the catalog of saints. Every member of the St. Peter Claver Society undoubtedly rejoiced in the great honor conferred upon our holy patron, who, in his wonderful humility, was wont to call himself the slave of slaves.

It is reported the miracles considered in the process of canonization were the two that hav taken place in our own midst, and in our own days, and are related by the great and well-known missionary Rev. F. X. Wenninger, S.J., who, following the example of St. Peter Claver, works most zealously for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the colored people, as follows:

1. In the year 1861, there was an old woman, eighty years of age, in Milwaukee, who had a cancer in the face, from which she had been suffering twelve years. On the feast of St. Peter she came to me, and I applied the relic of Peter Claver to the cancerated cheek, and the cancer disappeared instantaneously.

2. In the year 1863 there was in St. Louis, Mo., a man whose breast-bone with some of his ribs was in a state of decay in consequence of the disease called caries. His throat was affected by bronchitis and laryngitis; besides, he had the two forms of consumption called by the doctors pulmonaria and pituitosa. I applied the relic, and he exclaimed: "I am cured; I could dance!" In fact, he was at the same instant perfectly cured of all the above-mentioned infirmities, and returned to his work in the bakery where he was formerly employed.

CLIFTON, DAK., June 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish you would recommend the employment by the government of sufficient clerks in every department to transact its business as promptly as it is done in individual cases, and without taking advantage of every technicality to delay and harass its claimants.

As an example, I will state one of my individual experiences, which is only one of thousands of instances with citizens having business with the government, especially in the Far West.

I cashed a set of final statements for a discharged soldier, to the amount of $218. The deposits and interest amounted to $48. It was all certified to as being correct, and that the papers were transferred to me by the army officers. But, being in a hurry at the time I cashed the papers, I did not think to get the deposit book, and did not learn of my neglect till I tried to get the papers cashed by the local paymaster. He informed he could not pay the deposits and interest without the book.

I then wrote to the paymaster-general, and got the same answer, notwithstanding the government's own officials certified to everything being correct. It took me a year to find out that much, and that I could not learn the whereabouts of the soldier.

I then wrote to the second auditor of the treasury. It took a month to get an answer, notifying me of the receipt of my letter, and asking for an affidavit supporting my claim and identification and the final statements, with a blank receipt for me to sign; also warning me that every letter I sent inquiring about my case would only delay it so much longer, as they were so far behind in their business on account of insufficient clerks.

It has been over seven months since I sent what they required, and I hav not heard from them since, and never expect to, as it is notorious that it takes till the third and fourth generation for the government to settle with its citizens, like the way the French claims were settled.

Well, I hav given my $218, that I earned as a private soldier in the regular army at $12.87½ a month, up for gone. I would not take any part of the money without the whole.

In the land office department it takes years for the government to issue the patents, after receiving pay for the land, with all the delays, technicalities, and new rulings imaginable to harass the settler—though land business is a little better since we got rid of Sparks and his spies and detectivs.

I do not wish ex-Land-Commissioner Sparks any bad luck, only I hope he will be appointed land commissioner in hell, if he gets there, and there is such a place, to keep settlers from acquiring a continuous residence.

If you think this matter of the government employing sufficient clerks is a matter of importance, I wish you would please agitate and bring it before the public, especially as we hav such a surplus revenue that it puzzles both political parties to know what to do with it. Respectfully, your old subscriber, JOHN C. BLAISDELL.

SOUTH ROYALTON, VT., July 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say a few words through your very excellent paper. It is full of fresh thoughts and wise suggestions from far and near.

It is time that every man and woman understood the dangers which threaten our republic. But, alas! only a few know, that are in the habit of reading Liberal newspapers. The mass of our community do not hav the faintest idea about the deep-laid plot of the God-in-the-Constitution party or the Young Men's Christian Association. Our good women who are doing all iu their power to help the noble cause of temperance do not even suspect there is any trap to catch them. Frances E. Willard has made her boast that they intend to put everything under Jesus—to make him the king of kings and the lord of lords in all future time.

When that time comes you will hav no occasion to get out any more TRUTH SEEKERS, for Comstock will crush out all Freethought with the help of the Catholics and Protestants when they become friends like Herod and Pilate. We shall hav thumbscrews and gags applied to cut off Liberal publications and silence investigation. The good old time will come again when it will be a sin to use our reason or pry into the future. We might go to the pope for knowledge of our duties, and to the priest for help to make peace with God.

We look for your live paper every week as we would for a friend. When will people wake up to see and read the signs of the times? A little more sleeping on the part of our good citizens on the very brink of an awful volcano is all the Catholics want. They are lengthening their cords and strengthening their stakes all over the land. It needs more than Gabriel with a trumpet that should giv a blast that would echo through the world to wake up the sleepers.

Be of good cheer and work on bravely in the cause of human elevation and freedom! All noble, intelligent minds are with you. All the great and good who hav toiled and struggled to giv light and knowledge to the human race and hav passed into a higher and more glorious existence are with you to inspire you with wisdom and knowledge to carry forward the great work of emancipation for the whole family of man. MRS. H. J. SEVERANCE.

ORANGE CITY, IA., July 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Certainly you deserve a prize for tolerance. It may be that Spiritualists are great allies in the fight with bigotry, but it seems to me that they are the most tiresome friends that one can possibly be afflicted with.

Aunt Elmina hits the nail exactly. It appears queer indeed that those everlasting gentlemen and ladies of the other world never impart anything that is of the least practical value to anybody. It seems that all spirits, gods, spooks, angels, etc., must of necessity be on a level with the intellect of their mediums.

If spirits can manifest themselvs only in such roundabout and suspicious ways, it strikes me that the best thing they could do would be to retire from the manifesting business entirely, stay in their world where they belong, and quit bothering us in ours, where they are of no earthly and very little spiritual use.

Another much-mooted question is Prohibition. Personally, I am an advocate of temperance in its broadest sense, and think that Prohibition should include not only ardent spirits, but several other evils that sadly need it. A good many of our most sanctimonious Prohibitionists, who look down with contempt on a drunken wretch on the street corner, are guilty of sins in the secret of their homes that put them farther below the level of a beast than a gallon of the worst rotgut ever manufactured, swallowed at once, possibly could.

I am in for Prohibition as far as it can be brought about by logic and conviction, by showing the evil and its consequences, and educating the rising generation in avoiding it. But I object to Prohibition as it is run by Prohibitionists: Firstly, as touching only one vice and leaving others as bad alone; and, secondly, because it is too much mixed up with Jehovah, praying women, lying parsons, sanctimonious deacons, and more cattle of that ilk, which alone should make every Liberal distrustful of its aim, not being certain that W. C. T. U., Jehovah & Co., after prohibiting liquor, may not turn their attention to Infidelity and, being in working order, simply prohibit it, since it certainly is as much of an evil in their eyes as guzzling strong waters.

In fact, I wish that Liberals could fight superstition without Spiritualistic, and liquor without Prohibitionist, help.

DE LESPINASSE.

SAGINAW, MICH., July 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Last May a few good, bed-rock Infidels of this city put their hands into their always open pockets, and secured the services of that gladiator Charles Watts for a series of three lectures, and secured the Opera House and gave the course free—"whosoever will may come."

We had crowded houses, much enthusiasm, and Friend Watts planted bushels of the seeds of truth that the "followers of the lamb" will never uproot. Such a shaking-up of the "dry bones" as we had I never saw the like of.

There was a polite invitation given publicly through the papers for the clergy to debate. They would come into the hall in a sneaking manner, take a rear seat, listen to their "divine humbug" being torn to pieces, and then, just as Mr. Watts would finish, they would sneak out like a cur dog with his tail between his legs.

A local, unsophisticated, ignorant, and self-conceited Methodist Sunday-school superintendent got up to debate with Watts, and about all he could say was, "If a sheep eat a blade of grass, why does it turn into mutton?" Such a poor, ignorant "follower of the lamb," I'll guarantee, never confronted Mr. Watts. He used him as he would a poor imbecil, and when Mr. Watts had hamstrung the poor idiot, all he could exclaim was, "Rock of ages, cleft for me, let me hide myself in thee!" I exclaimed to myself, "O to be nothing, nothing!"

In every community there are a great many Infidels—a great many of whom, I am sorry to say, are in mortal fear of Mother Grundy. But let one among them pass around the hat and they will find it an easy matter to secure funds sufficient to get a hall, secure a lecturer, and hav a "feast of reason." Why let this horde of sky-pilots monopolize everything? There is no excuse for any community letting a winter go by without having at least one Agnostic, Secular, Materialistic, Infidel lecturer. "Let us all be up and doing."

I hav done in the past and always shall do all in my power to promote the cause of common sense and decency, and will never let a winter pass without having a course of Freethought lectures wherever I may reside—and I am not blessed with an abundance of wealth. Let some one in every town, city, or hamlet say: "Now, this winter we will hav a course of Freethought lectures, and I will make them a success," and how easy he will find it to hav them a howling success, with only a light draw on his finances!

Let us "wind up" by singing a verse of a Methodist hymn:

What bliss will fill the ransomed souls
When they in glory dwell,
To see the sinner as he rolls
In quenchless flames of hell!

Yours in the cause of mental progress, GEO. E. LIGHT.

LEXINGTON, KY., July 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: How much weakness must remain in the human mind, when so few are impressed with the idea that, so we can keep good principles intact, the proud flesh of corrupting ideas will drop off of itself! For ages has the belief in a God impoverished and weakened the intellect of man. The religious demon, who has drenched provinces with blood, though denounced for a time, has soon regained his power and influence. The Prohibitionists hav forgotten that one spontaneous act of the untrammeled mind in favor of the right is nobler and more powerful than the consent of millions of galley-slaves to any measure or opinion. In their eagerness for power to carry out their seemingly stupendous designs, they would be willing to engage the services of another Tamerlane to desolate the world, and to leave on the fifth part of the globe not a blade of grass behind them, provided that they were able to carry out their designs and that victory perched upon their banners. Again, they will encircle our loved ones with a wreathing mass of fiery serpents, to drive them into the blood-soaked, narrow way which religion points out. Our noble Constitution will be an instrument of coarse, unreasoning, and brutal domination. The pious way of coercing human beings into holiness will deluge streets with blood, crushing innocent beings under the wheels of a moral Juggernaut, seizing and submerging the noble mind whose element is truth under the bloody waves of religious persecution. The masses will be struck down by ruthless hands willing to be imbrued in the holiest blood, so that the pallid semblance of a reform may fill the land with moral pestilence, leprosy, and the contamination which attends the fierce and destructiv spirit, the fiery arrogance, of false revolution. Such mistaken ideas of improvement crush and control every thought, until continual inroads hav cast to the winds all that the human heart would cherish, would bleed for, would burn for—that freedom of thought which alone can fill our pathway with gems and dewy flowers of holiness and truth. Forbid it, justice! If the sun of our liberty sets in a pool of ignorance, depravity, and religious insanity, what happy chance again will there be to rear to the heavens the columns of a pure and noble civilization?

Future ages will read with wonder a description of the clergyman whose every honest thought is stifled by the synod or convention; who is led, step by step, into a narrow way lined with thorns where retreat is impossible, to obtain bread, the leading object of life. The least opposition makes him fierce; a well-built argument drives him to madness, developing all the malice and fury of his nature. False reasoning, abuse, lying, deceit—anything that can allay his misery—all these are resorted to in self-defense.

There is an eloquent divine here named Brossart, noted for his pure and noble character; but the common remark is with regard to him, that this is the work of nature and not of grace. ALHAZA.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., July 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: As a subscriber to and reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav read the communications of W. H. Burr and McArthur on Spiritualism, but not with the astonishment they would hav inspired in me three years ago, as since then I hav been with several parties on a spook-hunt to New York to investigate this spook business.

Now let me say in the outset that I claim we were all honest in this matter, and possessed of average intelligence at least, and that we came away with exactly opposit results or convictions as to the realities of what transpired at the séances.

Why was this? How could this happen? My theory is this. When you go to these séances the mediums are the masters of ceremonies, and they set certain rules and bounds for you to observe while trying to pry into the mystery of Spiritualism, which conditions must be strictly observed in order to bring the spirits into a communicativ and materializing mood. You are told that spirits are very sensitiv, so sensitiv that doubts and adverse thoughts disturb them amazingly, etc., and when you comply with these conditions and rules, as ladies and gentlemen generally do, you can't ascertain whether it is simply acting or reality.

We attended a séance at Colonel Greg's, and the acting, that is, spirit acting, was really so poor that I became disgusted with the fraud, as they were so poorly acting it that I expected we would only hav one opinion about it, yet, to my astonishment, when we talked over the matter afterward, I found we were evenly divided. The half of our party were sure they had seen spirits and conversed with some of their departed friends, and talk about this matter like W. H. Burr and McArthur.

We were at three of these different spook establishments, and our opinion as to all was about the same.

A short time ago the Gregs were fully exposed by a reporter of the New York World and some of his friends. They were not quite as mannerly as our party, and sat dunce-like spectators, but they caught the spirit, held on to him, lit a light, and verified their suspicions of fraud.

If you want to satisfy yourself on this subject, and for this purpose attend séances, hav some four or five trusty friends with you, then all of your party manifest all the childish credulity that the balance do, and the spirits will soon be strong and bold, and will come near enough to be caught, which opportunity you must improve, and catch them and be convinced.

I feel satisfied that if this plan were followed for several years by those who attend séances, the spook business would soon be played out. To talk about investigating Spiritualism scientifically, with the liberty and chance given those who attend séances, is about as ridiculous as to say, Now shut your eyes tight so that you can behold the grand beauties of nature.

If these mediums hav discovered a power known only to themselvs, it is for them to explain and demonstrate the matter scientifically to the world generally under circumstances which will not admit of deception.

Many hav had such chances, and Mrs. Diss Debar has had this rare chance quite lately to convince the world in open court, but it seems she never thought of the grand opportunity.

Spiritualism is a child of credulity, the same as all our religions and errors, except what is right and true between man and man according to the light of the best reason of the day; but we are slow to realize this fact, and so are humbugged in one way or another from age to age, and will be until we can calmly admire and weigh the discussion of both sides of a subject as we hav it in THE TRUTH SEEKER. JNO. M. GROH.

July 15, 1888.

TO THE REV. GEO. W. DUDLEY, Editor Christian Independent,

Dear Sir: Seeing a number of your paper reminds me of years agone when I knew you as a pedagog. I remember you well. In those days you stood No. 1 among your peers; you then did good work teaching solid, unquestioned facts in nature, philosophy, and science. You taught things you knew something about; you impressed tender minds with plain, reasonable propositions which are useful and serviceable to those persons to-day in the battle of life. Realizing further on that man is a credulous, superstitious machine, receiving and retaining impressions of fear and awe by which he can be controled through life with a certainty that has made him an abject slave, you, like thousands of others, profiting by the knowledge, hav got through with your early useful work, and now strike oil—a regular flowing well, so to speak—by setting up business as a guide, counselor, and teacher in the school of unknown worlds and future life—for revenue, with protection of your infant industries (the church) as incidental. You are telling your followers all about the glories, joys, and unutterable things to be seen in a great Utopia you do not propose to locate—only in figure, as "Abraham's bosom," the "New Jerusalem," "the abode of the saints," or "the eternal Eden," and so on. You preach to them that you know the way to get there; that there must be belief in a heterogeneous mess of stuff called the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, about which or whom it is impossible to hav any knowledge whatever; that there must be an undying faith exercised where reason sees only a man-made scheme to enslave the weak and ensnare the timid; that there must be rites, ceremonies, and worship performed in order to secure an election to heirship. You preach to them a lot of dogmas as of special use in the race, such as baptism, the sacrament, resurrection, prayer, forgivness of sins, spiritual power, faith, repentance, and election, with many others, and all this in view of the fact that thousands of others are preaching different dogmas and claiming that their way is the way to life eternal. You succeed—they succeed—in finding followers who suck in your various and wonderfully different isms and ologies. Now, presuming that you hav got all the points arranged in your mind by which you can clear up any and all apparent mists or clouds that may obscure the dull of intellect, and make plain as a morning star the truth as it is in your holy scheme, we propose to ask of you to come to the aid of more than ten thousand benighted minds, and giv a clear exposition of the heretofore unsolved and inexplicable riddle: If an eternal and all-wise God made poor, fallen man, knowing he would sin and die, did he not design man's misery, and doom him to eternal hell?

If you will write an article and prove that foreknowledge and foreordination are in God's case separate and apart, it will relieve his character of a blasphemous stain, as being a fiendish devil instead of a loving father. For such an article I will pay $25 when it is published in THE TRUTH SEEKER and approved by sensible reasoners as satisfactory. With great respect, Yours, JOHN BUSHEL.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Yarn of the Nancy Bell.

'Twas on the shores that round the coast
From Deal to Ramsgate span,
That I found alone, on a piece of stone,
An elderly naval man.

His hair was weedy, his beard was long,
And weedy and long was he,
And I heard this wight on the shore recite
In a singular minor key:

"Oh, I am a cook and a captain bold,
And a mate of the Nancy brig,
And a bo'sun tight and a midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig."

And he shook his fists and he tore his hair,
Till I really felt afraid;
For I couldn't help thinking the man had been drinking,
And so I simply said:

"O elderly man, it's little I know
Of the duties of men of the sea,
And I'll eat my hand if I understand
How you can possibly be

"At once a cook and a captain bold,
And a mate of the Nancy brig,
And a bu'sun tight and a midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig."

Then he gave a hitch to his trousers, which
Is a trick all seamen larn,
And having got rid of a thumping quid,
He spun this painful yarn:

"'Twas on the good ship Nancy Bell
That we sailed to the Indian sea,
And there on a reef we came to grief,
Which has often occurred to me.

"And pretty nigh all of the crew was drowned,
(There was seventy-seven o' soul),
And only ten of the Nancy's men
Said 'Here!' to the muster roll.

"There was me and the cook and the captain bold,
And the mate of the Nancy brig,
And the bo'sun tight and the midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig.

"For a month we'd neither wittles nor drink,
Till a-hungry we did feel,
So we drawed a lot, and accordin' shot
The captain for our meal.

"The next lot fell to the Nancy's mate,
And a delicate dish he made;
Then our appetite with the midshipmite
We seven survivors stayed.

"And then we murdered the bo'sun tight,
And he much resembled pig;
Then we wittled free, did the cook and me,
On the crew of the captain's gig.

"Then only the cook and me was left,
And the delicate question 'Which
Of us two goes to the kettle?' arose,
And we argued it out as sich.

"For I loved that cook as a brother, I did,
And the cook he worshiped me;
But we'd both be blowed if we'd either be stowed
In the other chap's hold, you see.

"'I'll be eat if you dines off me,' says Tom;
'Yes, that,' says I, 'you'll be;
I'm boiled if I die, my friend,' quoth I,
And 'Exactly so,' quoth he.

"Says he, 'Dear James, to murder me
Were a foolish thing to do,
For don't you see that you can't cook me,
While I can—and will—cook you?'

"So he boils the water and takes the salt
And the pepper in portions true,
(Which he ne'er forgot), and some chopped shalot,
And sage and parsley too.

"'Come here,' says he, with a proper pride,
Which his smiling features tell,
'Twill soothing be if I let you see
How extremely nice you'll smell.'

"And he stirred it round and round and round,
And he sniffed at the foaming froth;
When I ups with his heels, and smothers his squeals
In the scum of the boiling broth.

"And I eat that cook in a week or less
And—as I eating be
The last of his chops, while I almost drops,
For a wessel in sight I see.

. . . . . .

"And I never larf, and I never smile,
And I never lark nor play;
But I sit and croak, and a single joke
I hav, which is to say:

"'Oh, I am a cook and a captain bold,
And the mate of the Nancy brig,
And a bo'sun tight and a midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig!'"

A TEACHER correcting the history examination papers of her class.—Question: "Tell who the Puritans were, and why they came to America." Answer: "The Puritans were a religious sect who left England because they were persecuted. They first went to Holland, but left there and came to America, because they did not want their children brought up Dutchmen,"

A Close Call.

A TRUE TEMPERANCE STORY.

Temperance is a virtue. It, however, did not adorn the character of old Uncle Rube Carver, as he was familiarly called. Uncle Reuben was a genial old soul, and had many noble traits; but he was known to be a drinking man, and had grown to be quite a confirmed drunkard. When a young man, he thought a glass of liquor now and then could not possibly do any harm. But that was just where he made a sad mistake; for the occasional indulgence created, little by little, a very strong appetite for strong drink. All drunkards may trace their downfall to the first glass of alcoholic stimulant; and were it not for that baleful first glass, there would be no drunkards to-day.

Uncle Reuben's true friends kindly admonished him of the danger of tampering with the fire-water, as the Indians term it, but he invariably replied that he could take care of himself, and that he would risk rum getting the better of him. He overestimated his own strength of mind, nor did he realize the power of an evil habit over a human being, and it was not long before moderate drinking gave place to immoderate drinking; and in the mean time business fell off, and Uncle Reuben was getting poorer and poorer every day. He once owned a beautiful and thrifty farm, and raised the loveliest grain and vegetables, besides fruit of all kinds, more especially various kinds of peaches, such as the "melacatoons," the "clingstones," "rare-ripes," and "red-cheeks;" and Uncle Reuben, unlike some others, generously shared the fruit with his neighbors, while all the small boys and girls of the village came in for a goodly number in peach-time.

Now the farm, the gardens, the fruit, all were gone, and the pretty home place had passed into other and stranger hands, all on account of Uncle Reuben's villainous and ruinous habits. Once he was stalwart and steady and could do any amount of hard work, but now he was so shaky and his hands trembled so he could do only little.

Remember, this man once boasted that he would risk rum getting the better of him.

His wife had wept, begged, prayed, and implored him to abandon his dreadful habit of drinking, but all to no avail; and when she contrasted their former abundance with their present distress and poverty, she wept bitter tears.

When under the influence of liquor, Uncle Reuben was neither combativ nor beastly, but was good-natured and happy as the day was long. He would loll in his big arm-chair and talk and sing maudlin songs. His tongue was wagging all the time, and he made some very stupid speeches, and then would indulge in laughter all by himself. "When the wine is in the wit's out," is a true saying.

One day, when Uncle Rube had been shouting and singing himself hoarse, his wife, who was suffering from a sick headache, being nervous became greatly exasperated at her silly-acting husband. She stood at the sink trying to wash some dishes. When she had washed and wiped the last plate, and hung up the dishpan, she stood still with the dishcloth in her hands. It was considerably worn by use, and not very large. She commenced rolling it into a ball, hardly knowing, in her nervous condition, what she was about, until it was round as a bullet and not much larger. Almost crazed by the incessant shouting of her drunken husband, she threw the rolled-up dishcloth at his nose, and missed it, for women are very poor marksmen, or, shall I say, markswomen? His mouth being wide open as usual, the little round dishcloth flew right down his red throat, lodging in his windpipe. Uncle Rube coughed, gagged, clinched his hands, and stamped his feet, but the cloth pellet was obstinate—it would neither come up nor go down. His poor wife was thoroughly frightened, and slapped his back vigorously, but it did not start from its strange lodging-place. He grew black in his face and strangled. At this critical moment a neighbor happened in. Taking in the situation at once, he ran to the choking man, and in a jiffy turned him topsy-turvy; while he was in this position, the scared wife thumped her husband terribly between his shoulders, and presently she had the satisfaction of seeing the dislodged instrument of torture safely upon the floor.

It was a narrow escape. Uncle Rube was instantly sobered, and he then and there made the most solemn promises that he never again would taste any intoxicating beverage. He kept the promises most faithfully as long as he lived. And what do you suppose became of that poor old dishcloth? I'll tell you. Uncle Rube had it laundried, and enlarged by a gay border sewed around it. Then he had it put in a gilt frame, and it was placed on the wall at the foot of his bed, so that he could look upon it the first thing in the morning, for, he said, a glance at that would help to keep him straight and steady throughout the day.

It always reminded him of the close call that he had. He used to say that in all probability his was the only case on record where a man was saved from a drunkard's dishonored grave by having a dishcloth thrown down his throat.

His wife would reply that "Desperate cases require desperate remedies."

The moral of this story is evident. In total abstinence alone lies perfect safety. "Touch not, taste not, handle not the unclean thing."

MIRIAM.

Correspondence.

July 11, 1888.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I wrote to you before, so I thought that I would try my hand again. I hav not seen many letters from Ohio. I hav been sick since Christmas, but I am well now and go to school again, and study arithmetic, grammar, spelling, geography, and read in the Fourth Reader. There are a great many Freethinkers here. A few call to see us on Sunday—Mr. Lewis, Mr Webb, Mr. Archibald—and they hav a jolly time. They hav a lot of TRUTH SEEKERS and books from THE TRUTH SEEKER office. I hav the "Story Hour" and "Little Lessons for Little Folks." Papa says that it is not only lessons for little folks but for big ones, too. I would like to hav the "Apples of Gold." When I was sick, the doctor I had was a Freethinker. I hav a little more news to tell you, Miss Wixon—my oldest sister is sick.

This is all for this time.

Yours truly, EDITH BROWN.

An Eccentric Lamb.

Lambs are commonly supposed to be the pictures of innocence, but there is at least one exception to the rule, according to a Cape newspaper, which relates the particulars of an extraordinary career. Two farmers, while walking to a village some fourteen miles distant, noticed they were followed by a lamb. Since no effort of theirs could compel it to return to its fold, it was afterward carried to the journey's end by Mr. Watson, one of the travelers. As it grew older it became strongly attached to him, would sleep only in his house, or, rolled up like a dog, lie outside the door, when the approach of anybody made it jump up and create much disturbance. When the bell rang for dinner the lamb would be fouud standing by a chair near the head of the table. As soon as the owner of the seat took his place, it put its forefeet on his back as an intimation that it desired to hav something to eat. Grass and beef it would not touch, but mutton, soup, and candles it gladly ate, while it would drink tea and coffee without sugar and milk. It would run about all day with the dogs till dinner-time, but bolted to the dining-room as soon as the bell rang. It seemed to hav some sort of recollection of its youthful days, for it always retired to Mr. Watson's house whenever it saw a flock of sheep, but rejoined its canine friends immediately after its cousins had passed by.

A Carpet-bag for a Cradle.

One of the queer performances of the band of gypsies in Bridgeport, Conn., was the carrying of an infant only five days old in a carpet-bag. The mother opened the valise in several public resorts where she begged pennies, and showed to the astonished bystanders her infant offspring snugly ensconced within as if it had been a kitten. The youngster did not cry or show signs of being distressed, but several persons who witnessed the strange spectacle became so indignant over what they regarded as an exhibition of cruelty that they threatened to report the case to the authorities.

Just It, Exactly.

"I had my picture taken to-day," said little Christine. "I crossed my arms and leaned on a chair, and the picture man put my head in some tongs."

"Why, you must hav looked like a lump of sugar in sugar tongs," laughed papa.

"Why, so I must hav," said Christine, delighted, "'cause the man kept saying, 'What a sweet little girl!'"

Two little school-girls of infantil years were lately prattling together, when one of them said, "We keep four servants, hav got six horses, and lots of carriages: now, what hav you got?" With quite as much pride, the other answered, "We've dot a skunk under our barn."

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Religious Problems

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Poetry.

The Reformer.

All grim and soiled, and brown with tan,
I saw a Strong One, in his wrath,
Smiting the godless shrines of man
Along his path.

The Church beneath her trembling dome
Essayed in vain her ghostly charm;
Wealth shook within his gilded home
With strange alarm.

Fraud from his secret chambers fled
Before the sunlight bursting in;
Sloth drew her pillow o'er her head
To drown the din.

"Spare," Art implored, "yon holy pile;
That grand, old time-worn turret spare;"
Meek Reverence kneeling in the aisle
Cried out, "Forbear!"

Gray-bearded Use, who, deaf and blind,
Groped for his old accustomed stone,
Leaned on his staff, and wept to find
His seat o'erthrown.

Young Romance raised his dreamy eyes,
O'erhung with paly locks of gold.
"Why smite," he asked, in sad surprise,
"The fair, the old?"

Yet louder rang the Strong One's stroke,
Yet nearer flashed the ax's gleam;
Shuddering and sick of heart I woke
As from a dream.

I looked. Aside the cloud-dust rolled—
The Waster seemed the Builder too;
Up springing from the ruined Old
I saw the New.

'Twas but the ruin of the bad,
The wasting of the wrong and ill;
Whate'er of good the old time had
Was living still.

Calm grew the brows of him I feared;
The frown which awed me passed away,
And left behind a smile which cheered
Like breaking day.

The grain grew green on battle plains,
O'er swarded war-mounds grazed the cow;
The slave stood forging from his chains
The spade and plow.

Where frowned the fort, pavilions gay,
And cottage windows, flower-entwined,
Looked out upon the peaceful bay
And hills behind.

Through vine-wreathed cups with wine once red
The lights on brimming crystal fell,
Drawn, sparkling, from the rivulet head
And mossy well.

Through prison walls, like heaven-sent hope,
Fresh breezes blew and sunbeams strayed,
And with the idle gallows rope
The young child played.

Where the doomed victim in his cell
Had counted o'er the weary hours,
The school-girls, answering to the bells,
Came crowned with flowers.

Grown wiser for the lessons given,
I fear no longer, for I know
That, where the share is deepest driven,
The best fruits grow.

The outworn rite, the old abuse,
The pious fraud transparent grown,
The good held captiv in the use
Of wrong alone—

These wait their doom, from that great law
Which makes the past time serve to-day;
And fresher life the world shall draw
From their decay.

O backward-looking son of time!
The new is old, the old is new,
The cycle of a change sublime
Still sweeping through.

So wisely taught the Indian seer,
Destroying Siva, forming Brahm,
Who wake by turns earth's love and fear,
Are one, the same. —Whittier.

REV. SAM JONES is of the breed of Georgians called "Georgia Yankees" in that old commonwealth. He has a special eye to the laying up of treasures on earth although moth and rust do corrupt.—Ex.

THIS tribe having never before either seen or heard a missionary, the description I gave of the character of God, and our sinful and helpless condition, amused them only, and extorted some expressions of sympathy that a Khosi king, as they called me, should talk such nonsense. My preaching and speaking did indeed appear to be casting seed on the flinty rock, while they would gravely ask if I were in earnest, and believed that there was such a being as I described. It was indeed painful to hear them turning the theme of man's redemption and the cross into ridicule and making a sport of it.—Report of a South African missionary.

RECENTLY during divine service at Brezezie, Galicia, God struck the parish church with lightning. He killed three of the congregation on the spot. Six others were severely injured, and two hundred and thirty suffered to a less degree from the lightning and the falling masonry.

ALEX. HARRINGTON and Danny Shea, ten-year-old members of St. Michael's Catholic Sunday-school, Jersey City, hav been endeavoring to thrash a Protestant playmate of theirs into compliance with their demands that he become a Catholic, until his father has had them arrested.

OVER five thousand people attended the indignation meeting held in Boston on the 11th to protest against the action of the school committee in excluding Swinton's history from the public schools in deference to the anger of Catholics at its containing a bit of truth about their church.

AT a London mission council a speaker described how the hostility of the Arabs had been disarmed by the almost miraculous cures which science had enabled the mission to effect, "giving sight to the blind, restoring the use of limbs," and so forth. Religion then arrogates all the credit.

BISHOP LOUGHLIN has taken legal action to recover the tax of $567.48 levied in 1887 on property on Sixth avenue, Brooklyn, on which the church of St. Augustine is to be erected, claiming that as preparations had already been made toward building the new church, the property came under the church exemption law.

THE ceremonies accompanying the recent transfer to the University of California of the Lick Observatory, the gift of James Lick the Freethinker, were opened with prayer. Then Professor Le Conte, in his speech of acceptance for the board, commended astronomy as an inquiry into "the modes of the Divine Intelligence," and delivered a homily on the excellence of religion.

MONTREAL dispatch to New York World: "Another miraculous cure is reported from the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre. This morning the pilgrims who had made the annual visit to the shrine under the direction of the Redemptorist fathers returned to the city, and brought with them Nellie McCarthy, a child twelve years old, who has been suffering from hip-disease for five years. She could only get along with great difficulty by the use of crutches. The crutches were left at St. Anne's shrine among the thousand other mementos of like miracles, and the girl walks as if she had never been troubled with the disease. As may be imagined, her widowed mother is overjoyed. There will be three more pilgrimages to St. Anne's shrine this week."

OF the recent scriptural examination of 235,000 children in London board schools, the Dispatch of that city says: "It is somewhat remarkable to find that many of the children explained the maxim, 'Take no thought for your life,' as laying down that it is 'a positiv duty to be reckless of life.' The precise value of such 'moral' teaching is not apparent. The unfortunate children were asked what lesson was to be learned from 'Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn,' and the inspector reports that the question was not answered well, 'as it was not understood.' One young genius, asked to explain, 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth,' wrote that 'its literal meaning is absurd.' The reply may hav been the result of bitter experience."

THE bishop of London recently renounced his office to devote himself to the poor, in his closing sermon bitterly denouncing the church for its indifference to the cause of the workers. Commenting on this in the Journal of United Labor, Mr. Powderly says: "Centuries hav rolled above the heads of the races of earth in which the toiler did not dare to inquire why all that he produced should go to fill the coffers of those who had more than enough already. When the light began to break, the hope for something better began to grow. In forum and pulpit stood men who preached the doctrin of 'Servants, obey your masters,' but never did they tell who had the right to be master until the servants began to read; then they learned that under the canopy of heaven there existed no master save an all-wise God and the laws which the children of men ordered for their own government."

THE Pan-Presbyterian Council, just adjourned at London, received with approval recommendations to establish the liturgic forms of worship that seem giving success to the Episcopal church. In the old days the reading of prayers out of a book was odious to them as a relic and reminder of Romanism, but now the gray-beards find that with the decay of deep religious conviction the younger generation prefer such prayers to the prolix extemporaneous supplications of the ministers, and want color and sound, music, vestments, and ceremonies, to assist them in their devotions. One of the speakers went so far as even to advise that the services should be made complete without sermons.

THAT devout idiot and national ass Colonel Shepard, who prints daily a scriptural text in his Mail and Express, went to a Presbyterian prayer-meeting in Indianapolis the other night and, commencing some religious remarks, soon gave his discourse a political drift, and delivered a stump-speech on the text that "politics and religion must go hand in hand." We must realize, he said, the importance of having Christian men in high offices. He reminded his hearers that they had in their midst a man, General Harrison, "a candidate for the presidency, who was a faithful member of the church and would at at all times be in sympathy with needed moral reforms." He then branched off onto the missionary work, and concluded with the suggestion that if the nation had a good man at its head it could establish missions in all benighted lands, and giv the gospel of Christ to perishing souls.

OPENING and closing paragraphs of a Sun article entitled, "St. Peter's New York Army:" "There is no quarter of the city in which Catholic institutions cannot be found, and clustered about all of them, from the grand cathedral on Fifth avenue to the humblest of the seventy-five churches, there are parochial schools, industrial schools, asylums for the orphan and the destitute, hospitals, academies and colleges, convents, houses of different orders, and, altogether, a most wide-spreading and perfect organization for the spreading of the faith as well as for meeting the present spiritual and temporal wants of the people. One cannot walk the streets without meeting some of the fathers or sisters on their errands of piety and mercy—the Sisters of Charity, the Little Sisters of the Poor, the Sisters of Mercy, the Sisters of St. Dominick, the Sisters of St. Francis, the Sisters of Christian Charity, the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, the Ursuline Nuns, the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, the School Sisters of Notre Dame, and kindred organizations. . . . Thus, with its grand cathedral, its seventy-five churches, its forty chapels, its three hundred priests, its three hundred brothers, its two thousand religious women, its forty thousand students in colleges, schools, and academies, its support of fifteen thousand inmates of asylums and homes, and its Catholic population of about eight hundred thousand, and its capital of $30,000,000 invested in Catholic institutions, the city of New York is at present one of the strongholds of the Catholic faith."

Extracts from Voltaire's "Pocket Theology."

CATECHISM: A collection of pious, intelligible, and necessary instructions that priests take care to inculcate into little Christians, to the end that they may talk nonsense and rave for the rest of their lives.

CRUELTY: A troublesome disposition for the conduct of the affairs of every-day life, but very necessary for the maintenance of the faith. Humanity is out of season when either the divinity or his divine ministers are in question.

DIGNITARIES: Worldly titles awarded by the religion of the God of humility to his humble ministers who no longer think fit to remain in the poverty-stricken condition in which he himself remained during his stay here below.

ANATHEMA: A species of charitable curse launched by the ministers of a God of peace against all or any that displease them; devoting those to eternal torments for the good of their souls when they cannot get a chance of torturing their bodies.

GHOSTS (unholy): It should be an article of faith to believe in them. It is always as well to accustom people to be afraid of something or other; the church can only gain by it. The devil is the bugbear that frightens children of forty years and upward.

IDEAS (innate): Thus are called certain notions instilled into our minds so earnestly and so persistently by our nurses and our priests, that when we hav grown to be men and women we imagin we received them even in our mother's womb.

REPARATION: We are bound to repair the injury we hav done our neighbor, and the simplest and shortest way of doing this is to hand over to the priests the money we hav stolen from our fellow-citizens. Reparation is assured when the church is satisfied.

OMNISCIENCE: A quality exclusivly suitable to God. Nevertheless, he affects to ignore what we are going to do, or that we are free in our actions. The godhead communicates his omniscience to his priests. A theologian knows everything and cannot be taken at a disadvantage, especially with regard to things that are incomprehensible to anyone else.

ANTILOGY: A theological term to designate the contradictions to be found from time to time in the word of God. These contradictions are but apparent, of course, and none but stone-blind people can detect them. People of enlightened faith can perceive at once that God cannot contradict himself, unless, indeed, his ministers cause him to change his mind.

NATURE: Is the work of a God wise, all-powerful, and perfect; nevertheless, nature has become corrupt. God has willed it so, doubtless to hav an opportunity, now of diverting himself, now of getting mad. His bile is out of order, and if his works were of too facil government, both he and the theologians would feel time hang heavy on their hands.

MERCENARIES: Folks who do nothing. The priests of the Lord are not mercenaries; they frighten us for nothing, they quarrel among themselvs for nothing, they persecute us for nothing, they trouble us and divide society for nothing, looking to God alone for the reward of their labors, provided, however, the community goes bail for him, or pays them in advance.

QUACKS: There are two classes of quacks—the sacred and the profane. The latter are arrant rogues, one and all; the former are honest and virtuous men who sell by permission of the king and his chief physician the spiritual antidotes. Their usual way of proceeding to cure is to make us first of all very sick, that we may the better appreciate the efficacy of their nostrums.

FIELD-INGERSOLL

DISCUSSION.

FAITH OR AGNOSTICISM?

—o—

Two Letters from Dr. Field, D.D., editor of the Presbyterian Evangelist, to Colonel Ingersoll, and two Replies thereto. Dr. Field is one of the exceedingly few Christians who hav opposed Colonel Ingersoll kindly and courteously, and the Great Agnostic has used him accordingly. Dr. Field's arguments, however, are broken in pieces.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

"I GUESS it's 'bout time for that feller Harrison to pull down his shingle as 'the boy preacher,'" said old Uncle Oatcake, as he laid down his paper. "When a man's old enough to get the presidential nomination, his whiskers oughter grow, even if they don't."

POLITICIAN: "Well, Uncle Rastus, who's your man, Harrison or Cleveland?" Uncle Rastus (cautiously): "I'se gwine in dis year fo' Uncle Rastus, sah; he's my man. Is yo' meanin' enny business dis mawnin', Mistah Smif, or am yo' simply feelin' ob de situation?"

JACK: "You know how madly I worship Clara Gushington?" His sister: "Yes, Jack, and I think she is interested in you." Jack: "Well, I hav bought her a beautiful pair of bracelets, but I am afraid they are rather large." His sister (faintly): "Heavens, Jack! Those are not bracelets!"

A WEDNESDAY night prayer-meeting was being held in the Methodist church of Adams Corners. The attendance was slim, and as the crops were all in, no one seemed to be able to think of anything to pray for. At last, after a long silence, Deacon Obadiah Jones rose and said: "Brothers and sisters, as none of those present seem to be moved to pray this evening, and seeing we are all here together, I will improve the occasion by making a few remarks on the tariff."

AN interesting report of the death of a nativ was recently made by a coroner's jury in India. The nativ had the misfortune to meet a tiger, and the report says: "Pandu died of the tiger eating him. There was no other cause of death. Nothing was left of Pandu save some fingers, which probably belonged either to the right or left hand."

"SIR," he said solemnly to a young man who was anathematizing the weather, "do you know that the use of such language will send you to a hotter place than this?" "It may be hotter," responded the young man, mopping his face, "but it's a dry, honest kind of heat. They don't hav any of this blanked humidity down there."

FIRST Chicago woman: "We are to be admitted to the church conference to-day, aren't we?" Second Chicago woman: "No, indeed; didn't you hear? They voted to keep us out." "Oh, dear, I don't know what to do with myself this morning!" "Well, let's go around to the court-house and listen to divorce cases. We're not shut out of there yet."

"MAMMA," said Albert, "do you believe in the faith cure?" "Yes, dear," said mamma, "and I practice it, too." "Mamma," continued the boy, feeling his damp hair uneasily, "if a boy goes a-swimming and then lies about it, can you cure him of lying by faith?" "No, dear," said mamma sweetly, "that vice is cured by laying on of hands." And in ten minutes thereafter Albert was the best-cured boy on all Long Island.

A STORY is told of an old lady who lived in Concord, Mass., at the time of the great prevalence of transcendentalism, and she was very much bewildered by the freedom and audacity with which many of her articles of faith were treated. But she finally came to this conclusion: "I don't care so much about predestination and free will and all them sort of things, but if they take away my total depravity I shall feel as though I hadn't any religion at all."

SONG OF CHAUNCEY DEPEW.

I want to be a Granger,
And with the Grangers stand;
Some hayseed on my forehead,
A hoe within my hand;
And there before the granges
I'd stand and try my luck;
And Kansas and Iowa
Should cry: "Depew, Haw, Buck!"

A BOY'S composition: "Breath is made of air. We brethe with our lungs, our lites, our liver, and kidneys. If it wasn't for our breath we would die when we slept. Our breath keeps the life a-going thruw the nose when we are asleep. Boys that stop in a room all day should not brethe. They should wait till they go out doors. Boys in a room make bad, unholysome air. They make carbonicide. Carboncide is poisoner than mad-dog. A heap of soldiers was in a black hole in India and a car bonicide got into that hole and killed nearly everyone afore morning. Girls kills the breth with corosits that squeezes the diagram. Girls can't holler or run like boys because their diagram is squeezed to much."

Gems of Thought.

ALL the intelligent nations of antiquity were distinguished by a tendency to legislativ progress, till the freedom of that progress was checked by the claims of religious infallibility. The claims of an infallible revelation preclude the necessity of reform. "Should mortals presume to improve the ordinances of a God?"—Prof. Felix L. Oswald's Bible of Nature.

THE highest type of the orthodox Christian does not forget; neither does he learn. He neither advances nor recedes. He is a living fossil embedded in that rock called faith. He makes no effort to better his condition, because all his strength is exhausted in keeping other people from improving theirs.—Ingersoll.

WHEN multitudes of citizens belonging to the classes distinguished as "the better" make a hero of a politician whose sole aim throughout life was success, regardless of principle, and hav even established an annual commemoration of him, we are obliged to infer that the prevailing sentiments are not of a very high order. Nothing approaching to adoration is called forth by those who, on the death of a youth who went to help in killing Zulus, with whom he had no quarrel, and all that he might increase his chance of playing despot over the French, thought him worthy of high funeral honors—would, many of them, indeed, hav given him the highest. No feeling of reverence arises in one's mind on thinking of people who looked on with approval or tolerance when a sailor of fortune, who has hired himself out to an Eastern tyrant to slay at the word of command, was honored here by a banquet. A public opinion which recognizes no criminality in wholesale homicide, so long as it is committed by a constituted political authority, no matter how vile, or by its foreign hired agent, is a public opinion which excites, in some at any rate, an emotion nearer to contempt than to adoration.—Herbert Spencer.

HE was perfectly astonished with the historical account I gave him of our [England's] affairs during the last century; protesting it was only a heap of conspiracies, rebellions, murders, massacres, revolutions, banishments, the very worst effects that avarice, faction, hypocrisy, perfidiousness, cruelty, rage, madness, hatred, envy, lust, malice, and ambition could produce.—Swift.

I ADMIT that England is a Christian country Any doubts upon this point can be dispelled by reading her history—her career in India, what she has done in China, her treatment of Ireland, of the American colonies, her attitude during our civil war; all these things show conclusivly that England is a Christian nation.—Ingersoll.

PEACE—the only victory I covet.
To me war is no glory, conquest is o
Renown. To be forced thus to uphold my right
Sits heavier on my heart than all the wrongs
These men would bow me down with.
I thought to hav made mine inoffensiv rule
An era of sweet peace 'midst bloody annals,
A green spot amidst desert centuries,
On which the future would turn back and smile,
And cultivate, or sigh when it could not Recall Sardanapalus's golden reign.
I thought to hav made my realm a paradise,
And every moon an epoch of new pleasures.
I took the rabble's shout for love—the breath
Of friends for truth; the lips of woman for My only guerdon.—Byron.

VOLTAIRE was at all times the unflinching opponent of persecution. No matter how powerful was the persecutor, no matter how insignificant was the victim, the same scathing eloquence was launched against the crime, and the indignation of Europe was soon concentrated upon the oppressor. The fearful storm of sarcasm and invectiv that avenged the murder of Calas, the magnificent dream in the "Philosophical Dictionary" reviewing the history of persecution from the slaughtered Canaanites to the latest victims who had perished at the stake, the indelible stigma branded upon the persecutors of every age and of every creed, all attested the intense and passionate earnestness with which Voltaire addressed himself to his task. On other subjects a jest or a caprice could often turn him aside. When attacking intolerance, he employed, indeed, every weapon, but he employed them all with the concentrated energy of a profound conviction. His success was equal to his zeal. The spirit of intolerance sank blasted beneath his genius.—Lecky.

MORE than a century ago Catholicism, wrapped in robes red with the innocent blood of millions, holding in her frantic clutch crowns and scepters, honors and gold, the keys of heaven and hell, trampling beneath her feet the liberties of nations, in the proud moment of almost universal dominion, felt within her heartless breast the deadly dagger of Voltaire.—Ingersoll.

I HAV, O Lord! drawn your attention to the fact that, when you did, in the fullness of time, take to "creating," you "created" a good deal more than you were aware of. I hav ventured to bring it under your notice that you "created" America, and that, when your son and the devil went to the top of the high mountain to survey all the kingdoms of the earth, neither of them seems to hav had any notion that the earth was round, and that it was of such prodigious dimensions. Neither your son nor the devil knew of America. I am not quite sure that your son knows of it yet; but I could produce some proofs that the devil knows of it full well.—Saladin's God and His Book.

THE ghosts told us there was no virtue like belief and no crime like doubt; that investigation was pure impudence and the punishment therefor eternal torment. They not only told us all about this world, but about two others; and if their statements about the other worlds are as true as about this, no one can estimate the value of their information.—Ingersoll.

EVERY man is a consumer, and ought to be a producer. He fails to make his place good in the world, unless he not only pays his debt, but also adds something to the common wealth.—Emerson

Notes and Clippings.

AT Joliet, Ill., on the 22d ult., Bishop Spalding confirmed fifty convicts, making the cross on their foreheads and saying: "I sign thee with the sign of the cross, and I confirm thee with the chrism of salvation in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."

THE Independent makes an admission. Speaking of the degradation of the Southern negroes, it says: "For this Protestant Christianity solely is to blame. It allowed slavery. It was slow to see its enormity. In the South it supported slavery with all its power. It let the negroes liv in ignorance of the word of God. It raised no voice against unchristian laws forbidding slaves to be taught to read, and forbidding marriage."

THE melancholy information comes from the little island group known as the Nicobars that fifteen Danish missionaries hav spent twenty years in the islands without making a single convert. The fact that Christianity has made absolutely no progress among these islanders cannot be attributed to stupidity, for they are said to be wonderfully quick at learning languages. The Nicobars seem to be a very aggravated case of hope deferred, but missionaries everywhere are doomed to many disappointments. It must be rather trying, for instance, after five years of earnest missionary effort, to be sagely informed by the king of Uganda that Christianity is certainly a good religion to die by, but that as long as his majesty is feeling tip-top he prefers to cling to the practices of his fathers. —New York Sun.

THE government of Colombia has recently entered into a convention with the papal see, which is severely criticised by all the advanced thinkers of the republic. It is considered a retrograde movement. It provides that in the universities, colleges, and schools instruction shall be organized and directed in conformity with the dogmas and principles of the Roman Catholic church. Religious instruction shall be obligatory, and the principles of the Roman Catholic church shall be strictly observed.

GEORGE H. DARWIN, son of the great Darwin, has gone through a very laborious inquiry and statistical study and found that the facts completely upset Pope Gregory's theory as to the sterility of first-cousin marriages, statistics showing a "slight balance in favor of the fertility of the first cousins," as compared with ordinary marriages. This circumstance, he suggests, may be explained by the inference that marriages between cousins are more likely to occur where there is a large group of persons bearing that relationship to one another, and who, therefore, belong to families in which fertility is hereditary. But he found "a shade of evidence that the death-rate of offspring is higher than among the families of non-sanguineous marriages." As to insanity and idiocy among the offspring of first-cousin marriages, Mr. Darwin's investigations led him to the conclusion that the facts did not justify the popular impression.

God and the Bible.

Seth Green says that trout taken from a dark-colored bed to a lighter-colored bed will gradually change their color to correspond with the color of the bottom. No one may know at the present time how this change is produced, but if all believed that God produces the change, and that "the ways of God are past finding out," and that "it is wicked to question the ways of God," no one ever would know. We must get rid of the Gods before the minds of men can be turned in the right direction. The Gods hav always stood in the way of improvement.

Every scheme for man's improvement has had its origin in the human brain. A jealous God with a flaming sword constantly stands on guard at the outer door of the human mind, to prevent a new thought from entering. When steam was applied to the propelling of boats, it was said that God had furnished the wind to waft the boats over the waters, and that it was taking the work out of his hands, and would inflame his wrath and that his curses would rest upon the steamboats. The art of printing, the Copernican theory—in short, nearly every improvement, has been met in the same way and nearly by the same argument. God has never favored improvements, and the Christian cannot rise above his God. Both are in the way of the healthy growth of society.

The Christian believes that God is everywhere, that he does everything. He drives the storm; he causes the earth to quake; he directs the comets in their courses; he sends the lightning, and causes the planets to revolve in their orbits. He loves Christians and hates nearly everybody else. He gave the Christians a book to prevent their moral and mental growth and make them content to stand in the fool ranks and be drilled by designing ecclesiastics. I would not spend my time to expose the Christian and his God were it not for the fact that they pull in the opposit direction like stubborn mules whenever we attempt to advance.

The book business has been a little overdone first and last by heavenly authors. Did God write a book for the Hindoos, another for the Buddhists, another for the Mohammedans, another for the Mormons, and still another for the Christians? or were these sacred books each written by a different God? Now, if we should happen to choose the wrong book, we must go to hell just the same as if we did not choose any. Did God talk with Christna? Did he talk with Zoroaster, with Mohammed, and Moses? Did God ever talk with any man? If he ever did, why not now? If there was a time when he talked with men and then ceased from talking, did he stop without a change?

If God directed Moses and David, Solomon and Joshua, they certainly did not do as well as hundreds of others who acted upon their own judgments and were governed by reason independent of such direction.

Nothing can be more fallacious than the idea of God writing to and talking with mortals. There is no absurdity too great for men to believe if it is fully impressed upon their minds when young. It becomes a sort of second nature, and reason seems powerless to break the hallucination. It is a curious fact that the very worst men hav received the most instruction from God.

God was in daily conversation with David. His family should not only hav been one of the most exemplary in the world, but David himself should hav been a paragon of virtue. Let us see: In the first place, he was one of the bloodiest warriors whose name ever stained the pages of history. In the second place, his wives and concubines were so numerous as to outrage every idea of modern civilization. The way he obtained some of them would disgust a Turk or a Mormon. He paid for his first wife in a peculiar currency, coined only in the mint of circumcision.

To take Bathsheba in the manner he did was bad enough, but to murder Uriah, his most faithful henchman, finds no parallel in history for downright meanness and perfidy.

Solomon, the wisest man in all the earth, was the offspring of this unholy alliance.

David's son, Amnon, committed a rape on his own sister, Tamar, and then turned her out of doors. Absalom, another of David's sons, murdered Amnon, and then, as if to outdo any other family in beastliness, he, to use a scripture phrase, "uncovered the nakedness" of his father's concubines on the housetop "before all Israel."

The last scene in the great drama of this wonderful man directed by God is worthy of note. To let the world know that he had no equal among human monsters, and as if to prove "the ruling passion strong in death," when he was "stricken in years" and his last hour had come, and life was ebbing away, he rummaged through "all the coasts of Israel" to find a beautiful woman, Abishay, to fawn around him, that his lustful eyes might close with a harlot in his sight.

Was not that a model family to be under the direct influence of God? Could a family hav turned out any worse if it had been under the direction of devils? Go among man-eaters; seek out the lowest Mussulman among the Turks; go over Utah with a dragnet, and a more loathsome picture could not be drawn than the history of David and his family presents.

Can men who believe that such men and such conduct are worthy of imitation be of any great help to the world?

If God was talking with David every day and knew just what was going to happen, why did he not giv David's elbow a jog when David was looking at Bathsheba and say, "Davy, come away; it is a nasty business for a married man to be looking at a woman while bathing?" And while David was laying the plan to murder Uriah, why did not God say to him, "This nefarious scheme will never do; it will break friendship between us, for such an act would render you so vile that no decent God will hav anything to do with you?"

Now, my Christian friends, I would like to ask you if you would associate with such a family as King David's if they were living among you at the present time. If such transactions are low and brutal now, were they not equally degrading then? Can you believe that such a family was under the special guidance of God? How can you consistently fight the Mormons and believe at the same time that David was heaven's special favorit?

Can you not see that the idea of God talking with Moses and David and Joshua—all polygamists and bloodthirsty robbers—can hav no foundation in fact? The one who can believe that God talked with these men, and gave them instructions from day to day, can hav but a poor opinion of his moral influence. If God ever did talk with these men, he had many an opportunity of talking with much decenter men. God never talked with men, and never wrote a book. In ancient times so-called great men exercised a wonderful influence over the ignorant masses by claiming that their commands came from gods, and that influence is exercised by ecclesiastics even to the present day.

A Catholic told me once that a certain priest had such power over men that by the mere power of his will he could chain me to the ground so that I could not stir.

A man in Johnstown told me that he had a Catholic girl living in his family, and one morning he said to her: "If Father —— should tell you to put poison in our coffee, would you do it?" "Father —— will not tell me to put poison in your coffee; he is a good man," replied the girl. "We do not believe that he will—but suppose he should?" "Well," replied the girl, "if he should tell me to do it, I would, for I should know it was right."

This is in the afternoon of the nineteenth century. How much greater must hav been the influence of those who were rulers and regarded as holy men two or three thousand years ago!

Here is the whole story: Fathers believed those things and taught them to their children; they in turn taught them to their children; and thus the deception passed from generation to generation, and Christians of the present day are determined that the deception shall never die out.

This fraud was written down in a book, and when thoroughly understood, it is safe to say that no book ever written in any language has so much retarded the civilization of the people where it has been introduced and believed in. Because those who believe in it are constantly endeavoring to make everything square with the ignorance and dishonesty of the times in which it originated. The Christian's effort, when fairly sifted, is to exchange the civilization and the attainments of the present age for the ignorance and barbarism of three thousand years ago. This not only acts as a brake upon the wheels of progress, but it absolutely turns them the other way.

I am writing an article on the word of God, some portions of which are so beastly and vulgar that I dare not write them out.

Think of it—a word of God so abounding in filth that a man dare not read it to his children! No man would dare to open the Bible and read a chance chapter to a mixed audience.

I am afraid that some of my Liberal friends will think that I delight in rolling the nastiness of the Bible as a sweet morsel under my tongue, because I write this essay. I write not on this subject because it is a pleasant task, but because the Christian is constantly holding up the Bible as a model of pureness, a proper guide for our daily walk and practice, and as a book the like of which no moral or mental effort of man could reach. My object and my duty is to show the hollowness and hypocrisy of the pretense, and to put honest men on solid ground.

How shall we rid ourselvs of any great evil without holding it up to public gaze? How shall we abate a nuisance without showing where and what it is? It is sickening to see gloved ladies carrying this accumulation of filth and abominations every Sunday to church. But they will continue to do it until they are brought to understand that the gilt edges and gold clasp inclose some of the most salacious thoughts and indecent language that ever disgraced printer's type.

But when Christians talk of making the sublime of nastiness a text-book in schools, or even of having it accessible to the youth of the country, it is time for somebody to speak out and expose the rotten mass to public gaze.

Now, I want to refer the reader to some of God's chaste language, and to some acts of men under God's immediate control. Of course there is much that God has said which I cannot quote verbatim, for obvious reasons. But I will giv the chapter and verse, and when you come to read what God has written down in his holy word, you will understand why I do not quote the language. If the Christian could take a hint without being struck on the head with a beetle, I would ask him to ponder the fact that some of the thoughts and much of the language of his God-given book are too low and indecent to be spread out in the columns of an Infidel journal.

Now, I want every Liberal friend who has never been over this ground to get a small Bible, one that he can carry in his pocket, and as he reads this article, mark the passages of scripture referred to, and then, as he has opportunity, call the attention of his Christian friends to these select passages, and ask them how such thoughts and such language comport with the majesty and dignity of a God.

If all Liberals will pursue this course and do it in a proper spirit, instead of trying to force the Bible into the common schools Christians will be looking for something to settle their stomachs.

Christians teach that hell is the consequence of doubt. But if Liberals will be faithful in calling the attention of Christians to these passages, they will doubt whether a decent God could be their author, hell or no hell.

The first portion of scripture to which I will call attention will be found in chap. xii, 13. "Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister." This language was addressed by Abram to his wife Sarai. It will be seen by the first verse of the chapter that Abram was under the instruction of the Lord. Abram was trying to get Sarai, his wife, to tell a lie. It will not do to say Sarai was Abram's half-sister—she was also his wife, and that was what he denied, and that was a lie.

Did God ever place a man under circumstances where he was compelled to lie? The one who induces another to tell a lie is the more guilty of the two parties.

What would be the inference of any boy or girl who reads this story? Why, if so good a man as Abram was justifiable in lying, then we may take the same liberty whenever it will help us out of a tight spot. Not a good lesson for school-children.

Gen. xvii, 1: "And the Lord said unto Abram, be thou perfect." Would anyone infer that the Lord would appear to and talk with any man who was not perfect? Now, what must a child think when he or she reads in the Bible that Abram was perfect, and then reads about Sarai, his wife, being barren, and about Abram having a child by Hagar (Gen. xi, 30; xvi, 15)? Would not any boy or girl infer that a man could be perfect and at the same time be licentious to any degree and keep as many fancy women as he might choose? I think the schools will improve in morality when such lessons are introduced.

Gen. xvii, 12, declares that a child must be circumcised when eight days old. Did not God know how to fashion a male child, or must he hav one of those middlemen, transacting business between heaven and earth, to put on the finishing touches? Verse 14 declares that an uncircumcised man-child shall be cut off from his people. I ask every Christian to think of a God who makes it obligatory on some one to circumcise a child when it is eight days old, and damns the child if somebody neglects to do it. As well damn it because somebody does not cut its toenails.

Verse 22: "And he left off talking with him, and God went up from Abraham." How could God get away from Abraham when he fills the immensity of space, and is everywhere present?

Gen. xviii, 10: "And he said, I will certainly return unto thee according to the time of life, and lo, Sarah, thy wife, shall hav a son."

How many children, first and last, hav been born on account of these heavenly messengers, it would be hard to tell. Of all the ideas ever promulgated, that of an amorous God, or ghost, or angel, or spirit is the most ridiculous. If the people of to-day could understand how easy it was in old Bible times for women to be imposed upon, and how willing the chosen of God were to deceive them, there would be little mystery about a child being begotten by a spirit or ghost. Priests and preachers hav followed the example of these heavenly messengers up to the present time.

The key to these heavenly visitors will be found in Josephus (Antiq., book i, chap. iii, 1): "For many angels of God accompanied with women, and begat sons that proved unjust," etc.

Again (book xviii, iii, 4): "Then did Mandus leap out, for he was hidden therein [the temple], and did not fail of enjoying her who was at his service all the night long, as supposing he was the God, and when he was gone away, which was before those priests who knew nothing of the stratagem were stirring, Paulina came early to her husband and told him how the god Anubis had appeared to her," etc.

Paulina was a woman of high standing and great education, and very beautiful. There is every evidence that she meant to be a virtuous woman, for she consulted her husband in regard to the matter before going to the temple. This woman never could hav been imposed upon in the manner she was unless the belief had been common that the gods and their appointed agents often visited women for "holy" purposes. Let this belief again become general, and all the rakes in the country would turn preachers. There are about seventy thousand of them, anyway, and nothing would please them more than to hav the people return to the old superstition.

Naples, N. Y. JOHN PECK.

No Reason or Authority for Sunday.

Until I was more than fifty years of age, I entertained the dogma that one-seventh of the time must be observed as "holy time," in which mortals must not even think about business matters, nor "do their own pleasure." But since I concluded to officiate as my own priest and to do my own thinking, it appears very plain and correct that Sunday is not only a cheat, a lie, a contemptible fraud, but it is not sanctioned by any reliable and respectable authority. There is no Sunday in the natural world. In the vicissitudes of the seasons, in the changes of the year, in the diurnal revolutions of the earth and annual swinging in its orbit, in all the natural divisions of time, there is no discrimination of Sunday from the other days in the week. There are 365 days in one year, except in the Arctic and Antarctic divisions of the globe. According to order and natural laws, time or days should be observed in the year as the first day, second day, third day, and so on from one to 365, the 365th day of the year. There is no natural division of the year into weeks and months. If the moon revolved around the earth in accordance with the rising and setting of the sun, there would then be an opportunity or reason for indicating weeks and months. But we all know that a lunar day, lunar week, and lunar month do not coincide at all with solar days, solar weeks, and solar months.

To those persons who hav always depended on some one else to do their thinking, Sunday appears a divinely appointed institution. But if we take a natural and scientific view of Sunday, we cannot fail to perceive that Sunday is indicated simply by an arbitrary and unwarranted division of time into weeks and solar days. If we were to go a few hundred miles beyond the surface of the earth, what would become of this holy time, Sunday? Why, we would learn to our profound astonishment that "the holy Sabbath of the Lord" was or is wiped out by the sponge of perpetual darkness! Competent and learned natural philosophers assure us that if we could be transported a few hundred miles beyond the surface of the earth, the intense cold would exceed zero by hundreds of degrees, and the darkness beneath, above, and all around would be more profound than the midnight hour when black clouds shut out the light of the moon and stars, and furious storms wreck the autumnal skies. At the distance of only a few hundred miles from the earth, natural philosophers assure us, the entire canopy of heaven represents the twinkling stars as if they were set in a background of beautiful jet.

What becomes of our Sunday there? When travelers start to go around the world by traveling westward, at the distance of 180° they come to an imaginary line, extending from pole to pole, on one side of which the time is Sunday, while on the opposit side of that line it is Monday. So when a traveler, in sailing to the east, arrives at a point 12,500 miles east from Greenwich, England, he will come to a place where it is Sunday on one side of an imaginary line of longitude, and Monday on the other side, not one inch distant. Furthermore, if the residents of the Arctic regions are required to observe Sunday, where the solar day is six months in length, and the other six months only twilight and darkness, how are they to compute holy time?

We perceive at a glance what insurmountable difficulties are encountered when we attempt to show that there ever was a divine command to "remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy." In fact and in truth and agreeably to common sense and reason, the great creator never gave any such commandment; and the church and civil authorities, the priests and kings, hav no more right to direct anyone as to how he may or may not spend his time on Sunday any more than they hav authority to dictate as to when one may cultivate his garden, or go on a visit to the residence of a friend. Sunday is a lie, a delusion, and a sacerdotal imposition on credulous people.

Orange, N. J. SERENO E. TODD.

The Fall of Christianity.

It is repeating a fact which nearly every Christian pulpit in the land is emphasizing by its silence, to say that hell is no longer popular. And "thereby hangs a tale."

It is impossible at this late day to trace any religious dogma to its cradle. Whether hell had hate for a father or fear for a mother, is not important to know. That this terrible idea is being repudiated by mankind is one of the splendid triumphs of the human heart.

But the decay of this dogma means more than this—that a cruel thought of the past is being outgrown—it means that the religion of which this dogma is a part is also being outgrown. Not only does the highest humanity reject the notion of a hell for man hereafter, but it rejects the entire system of which this notion is the logical conclusion.

The Christian world may not be prepared to admit this statement, but we make it without fear of successful contradiction. The sounds of the falling structure of Christianity fill the air. Everywhere the death of faith is reported. The light on the Christian altar is going out, and it is going out because the oil that has fed it is getting low. The truth is, a new age has dawned upon the world—and a better and brighter age—and its rise portends the end of all religion founded upon superstition.

The dominating power of this age is not faith, but knowledge; not fear, but thought; not ignorance, but intelligence. The teacher is supplanting the priest in the regard of mankind. Preaching has lost its hold upon the world. The fact is, there is no need of preaching. The gospel which the pulpit has to tell is not worth telling. The appeal to fear moves only the weak and cowardly. The strong and brave ask for the truth, and fearlessly go where it leads.

The time when the minister preached "as a dying man to dying men," as old Richard Baxter said, has passed away. The living man and the man who is to liv after him are to be considered. We respect the dead; we would be tender to the dying, but our work is for the living and the unborn. Our steps are all toward the grave, but how we shall enter it should not be our chief care. We hav somewhat to do in life besides pose for a funeral sermon.

The general contempt for Christianity, manifested in the general disregard of its religious commands, shows the fate that treads upon its heels. It is not fear of the church's power that determins thought and action to-day so much as realization of man's power. The God idea is fast dropping out of human problems. Men are acting independent of divine directions. Human necessity is commanding the world.

The worm of death is at the root of every Christian dogma. The arm of the church is paralyzed. It is powerless to arrest the progress of the world which is being led by the forces of civilization. Christianity has no longer a prison for liberty, a stake for honest thought, a scaffold for free speech. Its rod of persecution has been broken; its lash of torture has been wrested from its grasp. All that is left it now is the idle threat of its priest, and this is heard with a smile. The only way left of showing faith in Christianity is by going to church. Such an act requires no virtue; it is only the tribute which fashion pays to piety.

Dead indeed is a religion when the people reject its dogmas and laugh at its priests. The motiv for accepting Christianity is gone. Hell is destroyed in its own flames. The power of Christ is not needed. There is nothing to be saved from. The church must stop preaching Jesus. There is no use shoeing a dead horse. L. K. WASHBURN.

Imbecil or Corrupt—Which?

He who starts out to work a reformation in anything ought to realize his position clearly enough to enable him to avoid injuring the cause which he represents. If it is worth espousing at all it is worth protecting against the opposition which its advocates may arouse by taking a false and vulnerable position with regard to any points of difference between it and existing systems. If it is really worthy of success it should be guarded against the venomous shafts of slander by placing it high above the level upon which such evils grow thriftily.

In an editorial entitled, "A Wise Judge," it is unqualifiedly asserted that the clergy is composed of two classes—"the honest minister, the one with whom a man's character or his wife are equally safe," described as "usually the good, easy-going, childish sort of person, a little weak on Calvinistic theology as well as in worldly enterprises, a man who nowadays would be said to be in the ministerial profession because nature had so constituted him that he was not good for anything else," and the "bustling, eloquent, popular clergyman," who "lacks the confidence of the business world, which keeps an eye on his accounts and also on the female members of his flock." It is further said that the first described is "totally incapacitated by his simpleness of character from undertaking the management of estates, while the second would require altogether too much watching to be allowed to do so."

Whatever may be said of their beliefs on religious subjects; however insecure a foundation such belief may rest upon; however ridiculous religious forms and worship may appear to skeptics, they should remember that a large class of worthy people firmly believe in and practice the, as they esteem them, truths and doctrins of Christianity, and that many of their ministers, bustling, eloquent, and popular though they may be, are men who are, in all their relations to their fellow-man, perfectly honorable and upright in character. The great bulk of ministers are as honorable-minded as any other class of men equally numerous and different in constitution, temperament, training, etc., and equally composit in nationality.

True, there are to be found among them men who are insincere, corrupt, and dishonorable. They are to be found in all professions. They are not more frequent among ministers than among men in other callings. Many instances of what passes for dishonorable action among ministers might be traced to lack of wisdom.

We giv our friend credit with not desiring to be unjust, but we all commit acts of injustice, sometimes unthinkingly. Such a course, if persisted in—and Liberals are frequently very ill-Liberal in this direction—is bound to react to our injury. It is in no unkindly spirit that we would, in these hastily and crudely expressed terms, call the attention of all parties to this evil influence which creates too much bad feeling and distrust to permit candid and useful discussion to take place. We sincerely hope that a spirit of fairness and friendliness will be allowed to prevail ere long which will allow of a nearer approach to the truth than is possible with passion-blinded eyes. It is easy to say harsh things in the heat of argument; it is not so easy to preserve a "judicial balance." M. F. CUPP.

The Reason Why.

Is God, like other beings, prone to shirk
His business? If not, who will explain
The reason God puts out so much bad work
When he makes babies? Why should he complain
Of raw material? Is it in vain
For him to try fine work when scarce of dust?
Has he run short of "nothing?" If he must
Do jobs inferior, it is not sane
In him nor just to damn the jobs thus thrust
Upon the market without their consent.
Eureka! I will pray and ask God what he meant
When he did deign to make, with little brain,
Witless and all inane, a select few,
In "his own image." Ah! Now, I'll tell you!

For I've been answered, and the reason's plain.
I'm now convinced God knows what he's about
When he makes fools and people half insane.
(I am a Christian; though I sometimes doubt
The word of God, I never let it out,
As do d—d Infidels. I always tell
What I believe; lest I should go to hell
I don't tell what I don't. Surely without
I acted thus I'd be an Infidel.)
But to my subject. There hav been fulfilled
Men's destinies as their creator's willed;
What craft is suited to a driveling lout?
Judge by the world at large; weak-minded creatures
Are fit for naught, succeed as naught, but preachers.

Mr. Moss Explains His Position.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just received the ever-welcome TRUTH SEEKER containing an excellent article on my case. It contains, however, one error. I am not a school-master under the school board. My Freethought views prevented me from getting an appointment of that sort—which requires that you should at least hav a recommendation from a parson. I am an officer of the school board under the "by-laws department," or in other words what is technically known in this country as "school attendance officer." Had I been a teacher I fancy the board would hav got rid of me on the ground that I could not teach all the subjects required by the code—Bible-teaching being one of them—because of my heresy. They may discharge me now, but whether they do or not I shall reappear as a lecturer as soon as the new board is elected in November.

I hav been a servant of the board for eight years, and the fact that they could not find anything against me, either in respect to my work or my personal character, was the only reason that deterred them from turning me adrift.

I am making it pretty hot for Mr. Kelly, M.P., and my Freethought friends will giv the members of the board a lively time of it as the election time approaches. Herewith I send you a brief article on "Bible Miracles." I shall continue to write for you until you or your readers tire of me.

London, July 9, 1888. ARTHUR B. MOSS.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY'S Catalog of Freethought, Reform, and Scientific Books will be mailed free to any address upon application.

Courtlandt Palmer's Funeral.

Courtlandt Palmer's obsequies were from his home on East Twenty-first street, Thursday, July 26th, and were conducted according to his wishes and permission. Last March Mr. Palmer, not having at the time, as he told his family, any fear of death, but wishing to be prepared, wrote the following letter to Colonel Ingersoll:

NEW YORK, March 16, 1888.

MY DEAR FRIEND: When, after my life's fitful fever, I shall start upon the long sleep of death, I shall want T. B. Wakeman and you to say above my ashes the last good-bye words—he first, you second! Not more than fifteen minutes each.

When I use the word "ashes" I mean it literally, as I wish my remains to be cremated.

If it be thought best to make my funeral a public one, I wish Siegfried's Funeral March performed. I shall write Mr. Walter Damrosch to this effect.

I shall not be buried from any Christian church, nor do I wish any Christian hymn sung. Let one song be a pean of triumph.

Yours very affectionately, COURTLANDT PALMER.

TO COL. R. G. INGERSOLL.

P.S.—I hav shown this to my wife. C. PALMER.

As nearly as circumstances would permit, Mr. Palmer's wishes were carried out, though Mr. Wakeman, who was present at the funeral, did not speak. The family, who are members of Heber Newton's church, supplemented the discourse of Colonel Ingersoll with the reading of the Episcopal service, and a few words by Heber Newton, who, to his honor be it said, spoke more as a man than as a minister.

Mr. Palmer died from the shock of an operation designed to relieve him from the disease which would inevitably hav proved fatal within a few hours. But he felt that he had really no hope of life. At 6 o'clock in the morning, just before the operation, he repeated to his wife his wishes as regarded his funeral and dictated anew letters to Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Wakeman, again declaring his wishes that they should speak at his funeral. He also dictated a letter to Daniel G. Thompson, secretary of the Nineteenth Century Club, giving his ideas in regard to the future life of the club, and fervently hoping for its prosperity and influence. He closed this letter with a poetic dissertation on death, reaffirming the Agnostic philosophy in which he believed. In making these arrangements Mr. Palmer was as cool and collected as if the thought of death in a few hours was furthest from his thoughts. He remembered that Walter Damrosch was away, and that consequently Siegfried's March could not be played at the funeral. He hummed a tune from "Tannhäuser" to his wife, and asked that a quartet render that instead of the march. He made a few slight changes in his will and bade all the members of his family an affectionate farewell. He was the most cheerful man in the room, and smiled sweetly as he conversed. In the few minutes yet remaining before the operation he calmly discoursed on his favorit philosophic topics, and declared again his belief in his doctrins, and that these would in time overspread the earth. "A man should believe," he said, "only what he can prove. He may hav every hope, but he should only believe what he can prove. I don't say there is not a heaven, but I don't know that there is. That is my belief." He talked in this strain for a while, and said: "The general impression is that Freethinkers are afraid of death. I want you one and all to tell the whole world that you hav seen a Freethinker die without the least fear of what the hereafter may be." These were almost his last words. The doctors administered the ether a moment afterward. The operation occupied three-quarters of an hour. Mr. Palmer attained consciousness enough to say that he thought the operation was a success. But the shock was too great, and he sank steadily, and died at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The hour set for the services was 10 o'clock, and at that hour the friends and admirers of Mr. Palmer completely filled the large parlors and hallway of his late residence on Gramercy park, and the stairway was also crowded. Mr. Palmer's friends include a great many, and from every walk in life. Lawyers, artists, journalists, society folks, clergymen of many faiths, doctors, and scores of Freethinkers stood patiently awaiting the arrival of Colonel Ingersoll. The body rested in a rich casket near the center of the dimly lighted parlor, and was clad in evening dress. There was no religious emblem or insignia about the bier. Flowers in tasteful forms were on the mantel and coffin, and perfumed the heated air of the house. At the head of the stairs the relativs of the deceased were gathered, the group being made up of Charles Palmer, Mrs. Courtlandt Palmer, Robert Emory Palmer, Courtlandt Palmer, Jr., Miss May Palmer, Miss Eva Palmer, Richard S. Palmer, and Miss Annie Palmer. Among those in the parlors were Mayor Hewitt, Edgar Fawcett, Judge Lachman, Thaddeus B. Wakeman, Professor Eckel, Edward King, Commissioner Andrews, Lillie Devereux Blake, Chief Engineer Church of the aqueduct, John L. O'Sullivan, ex-minister to Portugal; Manager J. M. Hill, President Foster of the aldermanic board, Assistant District-Attorney Jerome, Mark Eidlitz, Rabbi Gottheil, Moncure D. Conway, and Rabbi De Sola Mendez.

Upon the arrival of Colonel Ingersoll, the services were begun by Macgrave Coxe, who sang "The Hymn to the Evening Star," from Tannhäuser, which Mr. Palmer had requested. It was exquisitly rendered. As the last notes of the piano died away, Colonel Ingersoll took up his position on the main stairway, facing the audience in the main parlor, and began his oration. His voice was clear and musical, and every word could be plainly heard by all the people assembled. As he proceeded, Colonel Ingersoll's voice became low and tremulous, and nearly all his hearers were deeply affected. He said:

MY FRIENDS: A thinker of pure thoughts, a speaker of brave words, a doer of generous deeds, has reached the silent haven that all the dead hav reached, and where the voyage of every life must end; and we, his friends, who even now are hastening after him, are met to do the last kind acts that man may do for man—to tell his virtues, and to lay with tenderness and tears his ashes in the sacred place of rest and peace.

Some one has said that in the open hands of death we find only what they gave away. Let us believe that pure thoughts, brave words, and generous deeds can never die. Let us believe that they bear fruit and add forever to the well-being of the human race. Let us believe that a noble, self-denying life increases the moral wealth of man, and givs assurance that the future will be grander than the past.

In the monotony of subservience, in the multitude of blind followers, nothing is more inspiring than a free and independent man—one who givs and asks reasons; one who demands freedom and givs what he demands; one who refuses to be slave or master. Such a man was Courtlandt Palmer, to whom we pay the tribute of respect and love.

He was an honest man—he gave the rights he claimed. This was the foundation on which he built. To think for himself—to giv his thought to others—this was to him not only a privilege, not only a right, but a duty and a joy.

He believed in self-preservation, in personal independence; that is to say, in manhood.

He preserved the realm of mind from the invasion of brute force, and protected the children of the brain from the Herod of authority.

He investigated for himself the questions, the problems, and the mysteries of life. Majorities were nothing to him. No error could be old enough—popular, plausible, or profitable enough—to bribe his judgment or to keep his conscience still.

He knew that, next to finding truth, the greatest joy is honest search.

He was a believer in intellectual hospitality, in the fair exchange of thought, in good mental manners, in the amenities of the soul, in the chivalry of discussion.

He insisted that those who speak should hear; that those who question should answer; that each should strive, not for a victory over others, but for the discovery of truth, and that truth, when found, should be welcomed by every human soul.

He knew that truth has no fear of investigation—of being understood. He knew that truth loves the day—that its enemies are ignorance, prejudice, egotism, bigotry, hypocrisy, fear, and darkness, and that intelligence, candor, honesty, love, and light are its eternal friends.

He believed in the morality of the useful—that the virtues are the friends of man, the seeds of joy.

He knew that consequences determin the quality of actions, and that whatsoever a man sows that shall he also reap.

In the Positiv philosophy of Auguste Comte he found the framework of his creed. In the conclusions of that great, sublime, and tender soul he found the rest, the serenity, and the certainty he sought.

The clouds had fallen from his life. He saw that the old faiths were but phases in the growth of man—that out from the darkness, up from the depths, the human race through countless ages and in every land had struggled toward the ever-growing light.

He felt that the living are indebted to the noble dead, and that each should pay his debt; that he should pay it by preserving to the extent of his power the good he has, by destroying the hurtful, by adding to the knowledge of the world, by giving better than he had received; and that each should be the bearer of a torch, a shedder of light for all that is, for all to be.

This was the religion of duty perceived, of duty within the reach of man, within the circumference of the known—a religion without mystery, with experience for the foundation of belief—a religion understood by the head and approved by the heart—a religion that appealed to reason with a definit end in view—the civilization and development of the human race by legitimate, adequate, and natural means—that is to say, by ascertaining the conditions of progress and by teaching each to be noble enough to liv for all.

This is the gospel of man; this is the gospel of this world; this is the religion of humanity; this is a philosophy that contemplates not with scorn, but with pity, with admiration and love, all that man has done, regarding, as it does, the past with all its faults and virtues, its sufferings, its cruelties and crimes, as the only road by which the perfect could be reached.

He denied the supernatural—the phantoms and the ghosts that filled the twilight-land of fear. To him and for him there was but one religion—the religion of pure thoughts, of noble words, of self-denying deeds, of honest work for all the world—the religion of Hope and Help.

Facts were the foundation of his faith; history was his prophet; reason his guide; duty his deity; happiness the end; intelligence the means.

He knew that man must be the providence of man.

He did not believe in religion and science, but in the religion of science—that is to say, wisdom glorified by love, the savior of our race—the religion that conquers prejudice and hatred, that drives all superstition from the mind, that ennobles, lengthens, and enriches life, that drives from every home the wolves of want, from every heart the fiends of selfishness and fear, from every brain the monsters of the night.

He lived and labored for his fellow-men.

He sided with the weak and poor against the strong and rich. He welcomed light. His face was ever toward the east. According to his light he lived. "The world was his country—to do good his religion."

There is no language to express a nobler creed than this; nothing can be grander, more comprehensiv, nearer perfect.

This was the creed that glorified his life and made his death sublime.

He was afraid to do wrong, and for that reason was not afraid to die.

He knew that the end was near. He knew that his work was done. He stood within the twilight, within the deepening gloom, knowing that for the last time the gold was fading from the west and that there could not fall again within his eyes the trembling luster of another dawn. He knew that night had come, and yet his soul was filled with light, for in that night the memory of his generous deeds shone out like stars.

What can we say? What words can solve the mystery of life, the mystery of death? What words can justly pay a tribute to the man who lived to his ideal, who spoke his honest thought, who was turned aside neither by envy, nor hatred, nor contumely, nor slander, nor scorn, nor fear? What words will do that life the justice that we know and feel?

By the grave of man stands the angel of Silence.

A heart breaks, a man dies, a leaf falls in the far forest, a babe is born, and the great world sweeps on.

No one can tell which is better—Life with its gleams and shadows, its thrills and pangs, its ecstasy and tears, its wreaths and thorns, its crowns, its glories, and Golgothas, or Death, with its peace, its rest, its cool and placid brow that hath within no memory, no fear of grief or pain.

Farewell, dear friend. The world is better for your life. The world is braver for your death.

Farewell! We loved you living, and we love you now.

When Colonel Ingersoll concluded many of his listeners were weeping, and his own eyes were moist with tears. He read a short poem called, "The Future," which Mr. Palmer had sent him shortly before his death. Most of the people present then left the house. The poem was originally published in the Boston Investigator, and is as follows:

Trust no future howe'er pleasant.—Longfellow.
We know that all spiritual being is in man.—Emerson.
The world is my country, to do good my religion.—Thomas Paine.

Oh, what has the future in store for me,
The future so dark and deep?
What meanings inhabit its mystery?
What sounds does its silence keep?

How long shall my heart its heart-beats tell?
Shall my days my dreams destroy?
Shall seasons of peace my sorrows quell
Or shall sorrows conquer joy?

And what of the future with this life o'er?
Shall I laugh or shall I weep?
Is death but to open a heavenly door,
Or is it eternal sleep?

I cannot answer. In vain I try
The things of time to foresee!
What folly then to prophesy
The events of eternity!

But of one thing at least amidst all I am sure,
The one thing that's constant in change,
That matter and force must forever endure
In their limitless, endless range.

And further, of this I am certain, too,
That the chiefest thing on earth—
Which shall rule in the race while the true is the true—
Is the might of human worth.

In the spirit of man lies the spirit of good;
In his soul do the seraphim sing;
In the mind of man lies the masterhood;
Humanity is king.

And when to a sense of the infinit all
The spirit of man is allied
In a noble intent, then whatever befall,
His fate to the highest is tied.

The religious services, to lessen the sorrow of the family so far as such sorrow can be lessened by religion, were very brief. Mr. Newton began by saying that it would be presumptuous on his part to speak there, but for a desire that certain things said in private the evening before should be repeated publicly. He continued: "Two things in the career of our friend command especial respect and attention. In a city not over-famed for intellectuality, it was his part to dream a dream of a society gathered upon the highest plane of the mind. I recall distinctly his first enthusiasm years ago when he arrived at his social convictions. But when he dreamed, he dared to realize his dream. So, while men and women smiled, a club grew in this city—this shrine of Mammon, given over to thoughtless pleasure—a club devoted to generous thought, on whose platform every idea was to stand upon its own feet, by the force of its own merits. This club lived, and will continue to liv, a standing protest against the unintellectuality of our society, against its intolerance, and as a memorial of our far-seeing friend. The other aspect in which his career appears to us with peculiar force is recognized when we consider this city. It is a community of enormous wealth, and there is here also enormous charity. I am convinced that wealth does not harden men's hearts, and yet I affirm that the wealth of our metropolis has not been distinguished for far-seeing charity. It has been content to rest upon the accretion of its earnings and upon a selfish optimism, thinking that the world has been well ordered by the superior skill of the few. I am thankful that one man has lived who acted, in the sense defined by Plato, as a guardian of society; that one man has lived in the nineteenth century, in this metropolis of Mammon, who, set aside by circumstances from the cares of ordinary men, made it his mission to dream and carry out his dream. Wealth is said to be conservativ; it ought to be radical, for it has the advantages wherewith to effect the progresses indicated by new thought. The memory of our friend will liv; may his example remain as an incentiv to striving for a larger tolerance of thought." Mr. Newton closed his brief address by saying: "Hearken to the words written of old," by which he introduced a reading of passages selected from various parts of the Bible. When he had concluded, Mr. Coxe sang the hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," and Mr. Newton offered a short prayer. In it he confined his petition entirely to the living, asking for comfort to the family in its bereavement.

The remains were afterward taken to the Long Island depot and transported to Fresh Pond, where the body was incinerated. Mr. Charles Palmer said that the ashes would be placed in an urn and interred in Greenwood cemetery, beside the grave of Courtlandt Palmer's daughter.

The governing committee of the Nineteenth Century Club adopted this address after the funeral:

To the Members of the Nineteenth Century Club:

It becomes the inexpressibly sad duty of the governing committee to announce to the club the death of its president, Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, at Lake Dunmore, Vt., on the 23d of this month. While in the hour of sudden bereavement we do not venture to anticipate that expression of feeling which belongs to the membership generally when it shall be reassembled, we feel assured that the members of the club will cherish the organization with the more devotion now that it has become the truest memorial of its beloved founder. In accordance with the provisions of the constitution, the committee has selected from the list of vice-presidents Mr. Daniel G. Thompson as president to fill out Mr. Palmer's unexpired term. By direction of the governing committee.

WM. TRAVERS JEROME, Secretary.

Courtlandt Palmer's name is now a memory. May it be an inspiration and encouragement to every Freethinker in the country to do as much for truth, according to his capacity, as did our dead friend. Mr. Palmer sought diligently for more light, and when he obtained it made his discovery known. He won his splendid reputation by his courage, his honesty of life and expression of thought, his courteous generosity, and his faithfulness to his own opinions.

In Honorem.

Sunday, July 29th, the Chicago Forum was draped in somber hues, festoons of black and white covered the entire space at the back of the platform, and the organ and choir loft were similarly adorned—in fact, both the interior and exterior wore sable hues, with occasional letters in gilt or white, "C. P."

After the organ had pealed forth "Siegfried's March," the quartet sang "Death," from the "Truth Seeker Collection." The president said:

When announcing the death of Judge Arnold Krekel last Sunday evening—a Liberal loaded with honors and weighted with years, and whose departure was soon to be expected—I little thought that another life would seemingly be snapped in midday, and that the Forum would be clothed in the habiliments of mourning out of respect to the memory of him who so recently captured all hearts in Chicago, Courtlandt Palmer, ex-president of the American Secular Union. Having been for several years a member of the board of directors of our national body, during all of which time Mr. Palmer was one of the officers, our official intimacy ripened into a warm personal friendship, and I think I know something of the nobility of the character of Courtlandt Palmer, whose distinguishing characteristics were gentleness, sympathy, and modesty. You who were present at his valedictory at the last Congress will recall a sentence. Referring to the notoriety he had obtained, he said; "'Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some hav greatness thrust upon them.' I am of the latter category, for none could be more diffident than I." That was a fact. He possessed the unaffected simplicity of genius, for many literary critics pronounce Palmer's poems as worthy to be placed alongside George Eliot's "Choir Invisible." His "New-Born Soul" has something more than poetry in it; it has a grand and elevating philosophy. He says:

Marvel not that I say unto thee, Ye must be born again.—John iii, 7.
Those who can read the signs of the times read in them that the Kingdom of Man is at hand.—N. Kingdon Clifford.

Of yore, as realities,
Spirits, 'twas sung, over slumber-land stole;—
From such idealities,
Deemed personalities,—
Fancy has fondly created the soul:

Yea, as an entity
Graspless and ghostly, a vision-made man,
A phantom identity,
Bodied nonentity,
Wafted to heaven when ended life's span.

But heaven's locality,
Faded its bounds, to the boundless dilates,—
So, thought's totality
Universality
Sheds in the mind and the soul re-creates.

Thus, from past wandering,
Home to man's self-hood his soul has returned
Freed from vain pondering,
Zeal no more squandering,
Strong in the strength for which long it has yearned.

The soul a reflector is,
Casting the image of heaven and earth;
No more a specter is,
But the perfecter is,
Pointing the path unto worthiest worth.

The soul is a trinity,
Intellect, will, and emotion in one;
This man's affinity
Is to divinity,
This is the sainthood by manhood outdone.

So now the role of man
In his own manhood on earth shall be played;
So now the soul of man
Finds the true goal of man
Heavenly realms by this world overweighed.

The soul, in humility,
Turns to the infinit, rev'rent with awe,
But sees the sterility,
Feels the futility,
Godhead to limit in limits of law;

And yet it potential is;
Stars are its chariots, space its domain,
Thought its essential is,
Truth its credential is,
Science its symphony, Man its refrain.

The soul of HUMANITY
Is the good gained, the bad quelled through all time;
From dead Christianity,
New-risen sanity,
Saves us baptized in this race-soul sublime.

Thus in a unity
'Midst nature's processes man will be found;—
From such community
Free opportunity
Flows for the race in one brotherhood bound.

By art beatified,
Roused by the good and redeemed by the true,
Life by love ratified,
Through duty gratified,
Such is the soul's sweetest service to strew.

Oh, the nobility,
Ever with heroes and martyrs to stand!
Strong the stability,
Sweet the tranquility,
Ransomed by hope in earth's Eden-made land.

Taken such attitude,
Souls so attempered attain the divine;
Widened faith's platitude
By reason's latitude,
Things of the spirit the realest things shine:

And when the birth of us
Shall to the death of our bodies giv place,
Then all the worth of us,
Freed from the earth of us,
Deathless shall liv in the life of the race.

The letter of Mr. Palmer to Colonel Ingersoll requesting him to speak at his funeral was also read.

IN MEMORIAM.

Since last we met, Secularism and Freethought hav suddenly lost one of their most brilliant and distinguished champions, and a gloom is cast over the Liberal cause. Our late president and long-time treasurer of the American Secular Union—whose name stands as a synonym for princely generosity, for noble ideals, for moral courage and intellectual grandeur—has passed to the silent majority, but his disinterested, self-sacrificing, and exalted life adds a halo to the glory and sublimity of humanity. Born to the possession of vast wealth, his environments were cast among conservativs, but he disenthralled himself from all ostentatious pride, becoming the very type of a true reformer, for he sought to remedy the social as well as the intellectual condition of the race. He aimed to interest our American "aristocracy" in the lives of the lowly laborers; to inspire them with loftier ambitions than fashionable dissipations; to lift science and logic in the place of debasing superstition, and above all, to so secularize the state that the light and joy of mental freedom would be the rightful heritage of every citizen of our republic. The death of this fervent Freethinker is an irreparable loss to the American Secular Union. In an age of sordid selfishness Courtlandt Palmer's example shines illustrious in labors for the good of others, and his was the truly noble life, for

Wisdom and wealth and fame are glorious things,
And each may grace a life to which it brings
Its treasures to be shared—not garnered pelf;
No life is noble with only good for self.
Whosoever a noble life would liv
Must toil to aid, and gather still to giv;
Succor the weakling, smooth the rugged ways,
And with wise bounty sweeten all the days
He hath with man; so laying down his staff,
A noble life shall be his epitaph

Upon a rising vote, the memorial was adopted unanimously, and the quartet sang "A Noble Life," arranged for the occasion.

In introducing the lecturer of the evening, the president said: "Dr. McLeod has been one of the foremost figures in our society for years, and, like Mr. Palmer, has been a generous contributor to our cause. The doctor was formerly one of the faculty of the Iowa University, and is conceded to be one of the best biological as well as one of the most distinguished linguistic students. His lectures are careful condensations of the most profound scientific thought of the time, and he has specially prepared these numerous illustrations for this lecture, which is entitled, 'A Study in Organic Evolution.' It gives me great pleasure to introduce Dr. E. S. McLeod." It is a very modest estimate of the lecture to say that it more than justified the introduction.

Before introducing the lecturer Sunday, July 22d, the president announced the death of Judge Arnold Krekel, of Kansas City, Mo., giving his personal recollections of the judge, a brief sketch of his remarkable career, and presented the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, We learn with deep regret of the demise of Judge Krekel, who for years was prominently identified with Freethought and Secular propaganda, and whose talented wife is a vice-president of the American Secular Union; and,

WHEREAS, Judge Krekel is a recognized historical figure in the struggle for freedom in his state, for it was at his house that Governor Reeder, of Kansas, sought safety when flying for his life; and when martial law was proclaimed, President Lincoln placed unlimited powers in Colonel Krekel's hands, for the fearless and faithful performance of which his appointment to the United States judgeship was demanded by all the loyal people of Missouri, from the duties of which he retired only a few weeks ago; therefore,

Resolved, That in the death of Judge Krekel, the family mourn the loss of a kind and indulgent husband and father; literature and science a patron and co-worker; Freethought an able and fearless ally; humanity a friend; the nation a distinguished soldier, judge, and citizen;

Resolved, That the Chicago Secular Union hereby tenders to the bereaved wife and family its sincere condolence and sympathy.

The Truth Against Ecclesiastical Legends.

From the New York Graphic, July 26th.

No candid man, whatever his religious belief, can read the account of Courtlandt Palmer's death without profound admiration for his lofty courage and consistency. He felt that he could not survive the operation which resulted in his death. With calmness and precision he arranged the details of his funeral services and settled his business affairs. Then, before the surgeons came, he discoursed upon those philosophical and Agnostic views which had long been his moral guide. His last words were these:

The general impression is that Freethinkers are afraid of death. I want you one and all to tell the whole world that you hav seen a Freethinker die without the least fear of what the hereafter may be.

Here was a death worthy of Socrates.

Through some singular coincidence most of the stories that hav been given to the world professing to relate the death-bed scenes of noted Freethinkers hav told of their abject fear and their recantation of unorthodox views just before dissolution. Voltaire shuddering with terror and crying for a priest, and Paine praying for mercy to a God whose existence he had questioned, are the most familiar pictures used by the clergy to conjure with. Without questioning the veracity of these ecclesiastical legends, it is highly interesting to observe the peace and quietude possible to a soul conscious of no wrong intent and no base deed, although deprived of the consolations of religion. Courtlandt Palmer's death was certainly a magnificent vindication of his self-respect.

Such an exhibition ought to make more tolerant men of all creeds. It shows that the human mind can overcome that instinctiv fear of death common to all mortality, and die content without the aid of pious promises or immortal expectations. This man died as became a man, because he had lived as became one. Before the mystery of death his trust in himself did not falter. He had done his best, and he left the rest to what might be forthcoming. Happiest of men are those whose religious convictions are unshakable and whose lives are ordered according to the teachings of Jesus Christ. To such the grave has no mystery. But even to those less happy, who see after this life only into the twilight of an unknown country, death need hav no sting.

So liv that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams.

MR. PALMER'S SUCCESS.

"Casual Observer," in the Graphic.

Courtlandt Palmer once told the "Observer" that his greatest ambition in life was to make Freethinking fashionable, because it would then be on the high road to public acceptance. And Mr. Palmer was not far wrong—and he not fail utterly in the attainment of his object.

His Life Had Fitted Him for His Death.

From the New York World of July 27th.

The brave and even cheerful manner in which that pronounced Freethinker, Courtlandt Palmer, met his end cannot fail to attract attention.

"The general impression is," he said, just before submitting to the operation which he was assured would almost inevitably be fatal, "that Freethinkers are afraid of death. I want you one and all to tell the whole world that you hav seen a Freethinker die without the least fear of what the hereafter may be." The doomed man conversed cheerfully with his friends, bade the members of his family an affectionate farewell, provided for the cremation of his remains, hummed a tune from "Tannhäuser" which he asked should be sung at his funeral, and then faced what he believed to be an eternal sleep—like one

Who wraps the drapery of his couch about him
And lies down to pleasant dreams.

It is not necessary to share Mr. Palmer's Agnosticism—for he only said, "I don't know that there is not a heaven, but I don't know that there is"—to admire his philosophic courage in the face of death.

His life had fitted him for the ordeal. A rich man, he sympathized with the poor and sought to ameliorate their condition. He felt deeply and thought strongly on social questions. If his theories were air castles he at least tried to materialize them. Like Abou Ben Adhem, he "loved his fellow-men."

Colonel Ingersoll's eloquent tribute to his friend will rank high among the best specimens of mortuary eloquence.

Communications.

In a Marble Tomb.

A bequest to the poor children of Philadelphia. That, they tell me, is the royal gift of Stephen Girard; and, by the way, friends, did it ever occur to you that while God is occupying himself in multiplying the families of the poor to the end that his mighty name be praised and glorified, he generally makes just some such Quixotic choice of an Infidel of the Girard stamp for the purpose of doing what in all conscience he himself ought to hav done—or, as the Rev. Mr. Field would probably regard it, for the purpose of setting his own plan of "developing character" by poverty at naught?

These profound "thinks" absorbed my thinker as I gazed with a deep "reverential calm" at the high stone wall which, as per order of the late lamented Stephen, entirely closes from sight the beautiful acres of Girard College. Armed with the necessary document—I believe they call it a permit—we presented ourselvs to the "sentinel on the watch-tower," "guard of the round-house," or whatever that august personage may be called who inspects you with his eagle eye (it occurred to me he might be looking to see if our clothes were clean), majestically waves you to the visitor's register, and after you hav executed a hair-line flourish with a pen which refuses to make anything less than an eighth-of-an-inch mark, allows you to enter the grounds with an air of paternal indulgence that makes you feel "very young." Like Jemima Jenkins, "we did so;" and oh, what a jewel of beauty lay encircled in the gray stone setting!

The warmth of the June light ran like an overflowed river and tipped every tint with its molten glory—every tree, every blossom, every blade of grass shone in the amber air, quivering with life as if it loved to liv. Along the broad white aisles that intersect these living floors of velvet softness, ranged artistic flower-beds. Strange figures grow up from the dark, unthinking earth, and at the left, clear as if carved by a sculptor upon m rble, red foliage plants spell upon a surge of green the letters: "Girard College."

The main building of those beautiful marble edifices is a solid white structure girt all about by magnificent columns, so that it closely resembles the old church of La Madeleine at Paris, only in its extreme plainness. As we entered the broad doorway, we were greeted by—a statue! Standing upon the tomb where sleeps the dust that was once Stephen Girard, there is a man of marble—and its features are those of the sleeper. And oh, if ever a solemn voice spoke out of the silence of stone, if ever the approach of death shone from the blind eyeballs of a sculpture, if ever the deep anger of the helplessly outraged lay quivering in the paralysis of a statue, that voice, that look, that anger are locked in that still figure with its chill white face, its powerless white hands. For there, across the broad white graveled aisle, in a stone's throw from the spot where Girard's bones lie rotting, upon that ground which he bequeathed "to the poor of Philadelphia," with the money which should hav fed the children of the poor, is erected a most magnificent marble church to the honor of that rich God who needs it not, of whom the dead man knew nothing. There—there, so close that could the statue turn but three steps from its pedestal it must behold this huge monument of injustice, Superstition has reared her temple, and the black finger of infamy points to the sky.

And I, a Freethinker, had to stand so near the dead dust of Stephen Girard, powerless as the corpse, powerless as the statue, and see it all. Had to crush down the indignation I felt rise up within me, boiling like a flood, and say the helpless words of John Wilkes Booth, "Useless, useless!" They tell me that there is a law in this country—and certainly Philadelphia is troubled with the law disease about as bad as any place I hav ever seen; but I hav learned that law is not at all times justice; that law, like the Bible, can hav any tune played upon it to suit the whims of the ruling authorities; that law, to borrow a friend's expression, "Law is queer!" "Lex, Rex, Fex," wrote Victor Hugo in "The Man Who Laughs." The law is made to suit the king, and the king of this country appears to be Christ. Not the Christ of Judah either, but—the other fellow.

In this solemn hall of marble a footstep is many times repeated, a whisper echoes far up the silence; the mellow light from the upper air falls very quietly from the sky-lit dome along the wall; one draws one's breath and treads softly. Upon the second floor we see doors, but the doors say, "No entrance"—I suppose that means no entrance for visitors. We were speculating upon the probable translation of the laconic negativ, when a voice from above called, "Coming up?" We signified our intention of so doing, and shortly after we were ushered by the "come-upping" individual into a large room containing bugs and birds and beasts and snakes enough to hav set an ark up in business or started a young bonery. To a naturalist, an ornithologist, a mineralogist, or an anatomist, these dead things with the flashing of far-off seas in their shadowy eyeholes, seas that broke on the shores of a fathomless past, these birds of strange and magnificent plumage, these curious rocks from Bible-confounding strata, these skeletons with the fleshless fingers and toothless jaws, might hav been an interesting population, but to me, as I settled my unscientific gaze on shark's jaws and dugong skeletons and sword-fish and saw-fish and fish that I didn't know the names of, and dead birds sitting on dead limbs, with an astonishing amount of "reverential calm" upon their Gladstonian countenances, and glittering pieces of ore like petrified spray from a metal sea that rolled nobody knew where; and finally took the clammy wire-worked fingers of some "poor Yorick" in my own, I murmured to myself, "Golgotha!" and thought of the time when I heard my old friend M. Babcock exclaim, "Oh, what a set of bones!" This, our guide informed us, was a study-room; a long course of lessons in natural history. I couldn't help wondering if the boys used to dream about it nights.

We were next allowed to gaze upon the immortal Stephen's immortal straight-backed chairs and his old buggy and his strong-boxes, some of which were chalk-marked, "The Rousseau," with a date on them; the rest had some other such reverential name. I don't remember seeing any chalked, "The Paul," or, "The God." Stephen's taste in pictures was not particularly good, his housekeeper's portrait being the only one I recall distinctly. One thing, however, attracted my attention, as it bore witness to Girard's astronomical studies: an orrery, which in those days must hav been a rare and expensiv thing; and as I looked upon the dusty sun and planets with their dusty satellites, I almost fancied I could trace the touch of the dusty fingers in the quiet tomb downstairs upon these ancient spheres.

"That's all," said the guide, as he turned the key, and went bounding down the winding hillway of steps, leaving us to follow at our leisure. Outside once more, we entered one after another of the many adjoining edifices, finding order, cleanness, and silence everywhere. We climbed many stairs, and saw some people, but no one spoke; it was like a veritable tomb. At last, I waylaid a youngster coming from the playground, and sought information, but very little was forthcoming. The boy said he had been there six years, and liked it; if he told the truth (and I presume he did), he ought to hav known by that time. We directed our steps toward the ball-grounds, where the children were running with bats and balls like ants with eggs when you pour kerosene on the hill. Unlike most collegiates, these little heants (possibly I should say uncles) wear no uniforms, it being the will of Girard that the children's dress should be in no way distinguished from that of outsiders. The only thing which is uniform is the small blue cap with forepiece, worn by all; but there is no particular mark upon it. As we stood "considering the ways" of the ants, in accordance with the advice of H. W. (holy writ, not Henry Ward), a teacher began to gather together a certain elect, whose names he called from a written list. To Mr. Elliott's inquiry concerning this proceeding, a lad hesitatingly replied, "Going down-town." I think several more questions were on the wing, when they suddenly lit. Their flight was cut short by the teacher, who brusquely remarked, "Against our rules, sir, visitors talk to pupils." I hav not yet learned that this part of the program is in Girard's will. It seems to me that when an institution puts such a gag as that upon the lips of its pupils, there is "something rotten in Denmark."

But providence favored us at last. "Verily patience hath its reward." In the parlor of one of these marble sepulchers we caught a glimpse of a sweet face. I decided to interview. Happy thought! In a few minutes I learned that there were thirteen hundred pupils and some thirty-five teachers; that morning attendance at church was compulsory; that Jews and Catholics were in no way exempt from the daily sermon of a lay preacher, "which," said the teacher, "is in accordance with the will of Mr. Girard, when he prescribed moral training but not religious training." The preacher takes his text from that book of morals, the Bible—"our Bible," the teacher said. It was news to me that Girard College had a patent-right on any species of theology.

Later the lady, who was a pronounced Protestant, graciously entertained us in her own class-room, throwing open her class library for our inspection. The top shelf was all Bibles—"our Bibles." Each child is obliged to hav one, so we were informed. We then reviewed the hymn-books, which tell about the "lamb of God" and the—calf of Christ, I suppose. This also was a part of the "moral training" prescribed by Mr. Girard. At least, our gracious informant appeared to think so, and felt quite indignant at the assertion of "that man," as she spitefully termed R. B. Westbrook, who should hav insinuated that there was anything of a sectarian nature in the book. It was the regular service of the Episcopal church. This, it appears, had superseded the Moody and Sankey effusions, "because they"—they had no definit antecedent—"made such a fuss about it."

By this time it was evident which way the land lay, and perceiving that it was the only method of gaining information, I resolved to follow the example of the preacher who "preached to the Jews because they weren't there," and strike all the heavy blows at Catholic encroachment, reserving my heresy toward Protestantism till the interview was concluded. In the course of the very pleasant conversation, which lasted more than an hour, I should judge, we learned that the one Catholic member of the board of trustees (they are all religionists) exerted more influence than all the rest—that of late the Sisters of Charity hav been permitted to enter the grounds; which was contrary to the intention of Mr. Girard, though he had not specified it in his will. You see, he did not think about the nuns, but it was this very thing he was providing against when he commanded "moral but not religious training." I trust truth seekers will notice the fine discrimination and profound regard for the intention of Mr. Girard's will, that these sisters are ostensibly on begging errands among the hired help, who are all Catholics.

At this point our informant grew very animated in her expressions of fear concerning the possible outcome of these insidious maneuvers. "Step by step," said she, "they are gaining control of the college. I can look over and see point after point they hav already accomplished, and they will stop nothing short of their purpose. Under our former matron's règime the sisters were not admitted. Now they come freely, and I can see by the conduct of the help that they are being secretly influenced by Catholic authority." Of course we expressed regret, inwardly consoling ourselvs with the hope that "when rogues fall out honest men will get their dues."

This lady was not entirely orthodox. She had not much use for "Paulianity," and in reply to my quotation concerning the propriety of learning in silence from one's husband, exclaimed: "Yes; a young man preached from that odious text a few mornings ago, and I felt like getting up and leaving the church. We're not obliged to believe that, anyhow—it isn't inspired. What did Paul know about women? He was an old bachelor." "So was Christ," retorted Mr. Elliott, in his smooth, cool voice. In spite of herself, a heretical smile broke like a ripple of runaway sunshine over the expressiv lips, but she gravely "feared we were not very good." I fear she was right.

A visit to the dormitories and the immense dining-room, where the children sat on rows of uncomfortable little backless stools, that simply made one's spine ache to look at, completed our survey of the institution. We went away sadder and wiser, having learned some curious things regarding "Mr. Girard's intentions." We learned that when Girard said "moral" he meant "Protestant;" that when he forbade the entrance of priests and ministers he meant only priests, nuns, and union label preachers; that moral instructors were scab preachers, so to speak; that the Bible, "our Bible," was Girard's idea of a rule of moral guidance; that the Episcopalian service was non-sectarian; that Moody and Sankey was non-sectarian, and was exchanged for the service only on account of that bothersome "they," with no antecedent; that all this, in Stephen Girard's idea, was morality and not religion. We learned that the control of the college is no longer a question between Freethought and religious usurpation—it has passed beyond that, and has become a bone of contention between Protestant assumption and Catholic cunning. Between these two there can be no question of the final result: Rome always triumphs. Across the tomb and its sleeping dust, across the statue with its wide eyeballs of stone, its helpless hands, its powerless limbs, across the soft light and the amber air, across the wide, green stretch of earth bequeathed to the children of the poor, across the broad walks and high up over the guarding wall, a shadow is falling—a shadow stolen from over the sea; creeping, creeping to the dead man's feet, slowly as the tide creeps up and over the rocks. Girard's bones lie covered by the pall of the Vatican. And the statue hears the laughter of his thirteen hundred children, while the shadow grows, and in the darkness the holy conclave weaves its foothold of mystery. The pope has set his foot upon a grave, and when the vicar of Christ moves forward on a staircase of tombs, beware! He never steps back.

What are you Freethinkers doing? Where is your spirit, your honor? Will you see a dead man robbed—nay, will you yourselvs be robbed and make no protest? Long ago, I am sure, the energetic secretary of our National Union would hav brought this outrage to a crucial test, had he but received the necessary support. Wake up! Above the tomb of Girard the church will plant her foot upon another—the tomb of liberty. What are you going to do?

VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE.

From Ingersoll's "Talmagian Catechism."

Question. Do we know where the garden of Eden was, and hav we ever found any place where a "river parted and became into four heads?"

Answer. We are not certain where this garden was, and the river that parted into four heads cannot at present be found. Infidels hav had a great deal to say about these four rivers, but they will wish they had even one, one of these days.

Dr. Silversmith's Theory of the Universe.

[The Chicago Secular Union is indebted to Julius Silversmith, M.A., editor of the Jewish Occident, author of a valuable volume entitled, "The System and History of Nature," and one of the most proficient linguists in the West, for his recent illustrated lecture on "A Practical and Comprehensiv Theory of our Universe," which, while quite interesting and highly appreciated, rather astonished his hearers in its demolition of what we hav heretofore considered established facts of science. That a gentleman of such depth and learning should lend this theory his name and influence will be a matter in which your scientific readers will doubtless be deeply interested, so I forward a slight synopsis of this discourse.—E. A. STEVENS.]

The speaker described the primitiv notions entertained by our Egyptian ancestors, and explained how the authors of Genesis and Bible writers conceived the firmament. The people on the Nile, being a nomadic race, saw the planets move from east to west, believing that the earth was a flat body, resting upon huge serpents, these upon a gigantic turtle, and the whole upon the "deep oceans or water." The speaker next showed by a diagram the Copernican, Kepler, Newton, and Galileo solar systems; how the planets moved in concentric and closed ellipses around the sun. At this juncture the speaker showed most conclusivly the falsely conceived notions, despite the great strides made in astronomy, physics, and dynamics, that no planet could revolve in a closed ellipsis if the sun was moving onward in her orbit; that the revolution assigned to our earth would cause every object on her surface to fly off, if the motion of her revolution around herself of three and a half miles per second were true. The speaker introduced the most practical conception of the heavenly planets and our solar system. The diagram exhibited the movement of the three heavenly bodies —the sun, the earth, and the moon. He pointed to the motion of the sun as being in an undulatory line from west to east, proving it by certain dark protuberances near his periphery, first on the under side, then successivly every twenty-seven days near his upper edge. He next exhibited the earth's zigzag motion, moving along with the sun, but in a spiral movement, which would produce the same effect for the seasons.

For lack of time he could not explain in detail the physical effect that caused day and night, but said the motion of the earth could best be conceived by the rising and the setting of the sun, if the zigzag movement is correct. He took to task our modern observatory magnates, who were great in elucidating with mathematical formulas, but gave the world no clear conception of how the planets and our solar system moved; that they weighed, measured, and allowed a kicking attraction demon to play his antics; that they employed the differential and integral calculus (a sort of roundabout way to account for their exact prophecies of eclipses and conjunctions), when a simple periodical-arithmetic calculation could accomplish the same solution with an understanding of this new system; that the motion of the moon (being much more aerial or less dense than our earth) was in like spiral form in a more digressionary orbit, as shown by a diagram in which his peculiar faces were plainly to be seen, and which no modern astronomer had yet been able or willing, if he understood it, to illustrate. The speaker also gave the prevalent or accepted theory of the coming in existence of the heavenly planets, as taught by the famous French philosopher La Place, who teaches that primarily the firmament contained a nebular mass, which, when it became disintegrated, allowed the smaller parts or fragments to revolve around the larger suns; that millions of such solar systems are now roaming through the measureless firmament, and that Lavoisieur, a more recent French philosopher, corroborated this fact.

The lecturer pointed out the fabulous notions entertained by the dogmatic believers and the ecclesiastic, who would brook no abatement from the Genesis account of the creation, and showed how utterly fallacious the idea appears that a deity should hav accomplished such a gigantic feat in seven days, when in fact the laws of nature and the physical principles and conditions would by far be a most comprehensiv and practical means of bringing our firmament to a natural and progressiv existence and to the human understanding; that the mathematical formulas were simply a blinding method; the ordinary mortal (possibly one out of a thousand) could understand them, and even Sir Isaac Newton was compelled to own that the firmament was placed in a sort of Sensorium Deum, so as to pacify his ecclesiastical British censors.

The German ecclesiasts were no less bitter on Von Humboldt when he published his "Kosmos." The scientific world was, however, beginning to realize that the theory of Edward Löwenthal was one worthy of credence. Even Professor Noak, one of Germany's savants, coincided with these projections, while in France, Italy, and Spain the new firmamental theory was already largely accepted by scientists. The most important part of the discourse was vouchsafed in the following ideas: Since the motion and orbits of the planets were as shown, the lecture dwelt at length upon the historical cycles of our earth. That while our solar system was in its highest orbit position (perihelion) when the matter spheres are of intense heat, and as heat rises, it follows that only by some vehement magnetic force the species of gigantea, fauna, and flora could be evolved under such a physical status. He showed that the extinct species megatheria, mastodons, dynoteria, were now only formed as paleontological relics. They were now nowhere adduced, because the matter spheres surrounding our globe would not permit their coming into existence. The fern, spruce, and pine species of plants and trees were in the States an adjunct covering the surface of our earth, the physical changes that rent the earth by volcanic eruptions and plications permitting the layers of trees and of vast forests to be submerged by oceans, and in turn, when the waters had again been made to recede, caused the plants and trees that were buried to crystallize into what is now an essential and costly modicum, known as anthracite and bituminous coal, and is designated by geologists as the carboniferous period. Thus the lecturer argued that (as shown in a diagram) the solar system was traversing an orbit which requires, periodically speaking, two and one-half million years, and that it had times without number performed the same journeys; when it reached the aphelion in its orbit, or lowest point, that our earth tended to a cooling or collapsing process, a sort of inflation. This was termed by him the glacial era, in which the late Professor Agassiz had demonstrated that all life would tend to destruction and death, until the solar system would again reach on her ascending node the warm matter spheres, and the germs in all species would be again enlivened by that electro-magnetic force which is always present and developed in the invisible matter spheres surrounding our globe. These cycles he designated as the great summer and great winter seasons, or rather periods. Thus, as all living species were formed according to the contents of the various matter strata, so must man hav made his advent on this mundane sphere, not, as has been taught by Bible writers, from one pair, but, as Lamarck indicates, uniformly all over the globe and simultaneously with the capabilities of the matter spheres. That the species of human being could only hav evolved while our solar course was three-fifths speed in her course toward the aphelion. That in another million of years our earth would again assume an entire physical change by reason of the enlivening light and heat of the sun and the altered position in his upward node toward the perihelion. The speaker regretted that he could not go into the more abstract details of the chemical and physical effects which might help his auditors to understand the plan of the theory enunciated, and hoped that on some future occasion he would elucidate his subject, which he then presented as an outline only.

California Letter.

I rise to second the motion of our fellow-worker, L. K. Washburn, as set forth in his card to the Liberal public in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 23d, to bring out a book of songs and tunes adapted to the use of Liberals at meetings, funerals, and social gatherings.

This is a move in the right direction, as all Liberal thinkers must know that the use of these old words, which stand for myths, only serves to perpetuate the superstitions which, by the logic of facts, we are striving to dissipate.

The words God, Christ, Jesus, Holy Ghost, holy spirit, holy angels, eternal spirit, are all signs and symbols with which the gospel of fear has peopled the unseen realm.

Holy spirit, divine spirit, are terms which are used to express our ignorance, and are the bedrock of belief in gnomes, fairies, sprites, witches, devils, and human spirits; and the constant use of this spooky vocabulary tends to poison the minds of young people and to induct them into the devious paths of false religion.

And I could not help but think during my recent visit to the Oakland camp-meeting of Spiritualists, How changed are these people from twenty years ago! Then they were warm and activ in the advocacy of all reforms which relate to us in this life. Now they are fast crystallizing into a dead level like churchism, and a Liberal speaker who has something to say about the struggles of mundane life is counted out as off-color and foreign to Spiritualism.

To me this great gathering so held down to this one idea of spirits in their songs, speeches, and exercises, and in fact the entire performance, so devoid of any high purpose to stimulate men and women to fight against the evils and right the wrongs in this life, and the constant, monotonous, and dreary platitudes of occultism and summer-land, gave me the sad feeling as if in a graveyard rather than among healthy, living people.

Just enough of occultism to inspire a hope in a life beyond serves a good purpose, while the dogmatic and mercantil aspect of Spiritism drags its votaries down to a morbid eagerness for curious mental antics, and a total disrelish for the great facts of our life which underlie our well-being in this world, and shows clearly that orthodox Spiritualism, as it manifests itself under the management of this camp-meeting ring, is simply another form of religion, with its Fe, fo, fi, fum, based upon the belief that mental wonders in living people prove a future life.

The tests given by John Slater and Mr. Emerson at the meeting were all of that character which, while wonderful, only went to show the power of a supersensitiv brain to worm out from many in the audience the names of their dead, and to point out in some cases the fact of pictures or photographs hidden away in the pockets of strangers, and to tell some persons of the audience what they said and what they did before they came to the meeting. All this is indeed wonderful, and yet I must say that these mental performances, while they seem for the time being to convince many of a future state, come far short of anything like absolute proof of life beyond the grave, to my mind.

And while I may hold a rational belief in a future state, based upon the various manifestations of the occult, or psychic force, I am unable to reach such a conviction as knowledge affords.

Some people do not seem to discriminate between belief and knowledge.

Belief fills the mind with a hankering after more proof; while knowledge, which is verified truth, and capable of demonstration, satisfies and rests the mind.

When a person affirms to me a knowledge of the other life, I simply pass, and feel that it is unfortunate that my friend should hold such vital knowledge and be utterly unable to impart such knowledge to me.

All that deserves the name of knowledge or pure truth can be imparted, and is absolute; while all belief, however rational, cannot be demonstrated, and belongs to the realm of theory, faith, and superstition.

Yea, Brother Washburn, bring out your songs and tunes, divested as far as possible of all spooky words and sentiments, and let us sing, and teach the children to sing, under the natural inspiration of "the good, the true, and the beautiful," and thus grow up free from the nightmare of religious superstition.

Don't take old church poetry and mutilate it to fit the case—as such a bobtail method seems too cheap and too cheeky; giv us some poetry true to nature, and set to modern music.

To sing "Nearer, O truth, to thee!" to the old-time tune of "Nearer, my God, to thee!" is like a dead giv-away.

Aside from a few songs adapted to funerals, we need glee music; and I find that our audiences are best pleased with glee and secular music, and ballads which inspire sentiments akin to nature and truth, and in harmony with what we are trying to teach to the people.

Five years ago, Laura E. Hall, of Seattle, W. T., a noble Liberal worker, and daughter of that stanch Freethinker D. M. Crane, prepared in manuscript a book of songs and tunes for publication, which for some reason did not appear; and we are quite sure our friend Mrs. Hall, who is full of music and song, will be pleased to confer with Brother Washburn, and contribute some of her selections to the forthcoming Liberal song-book.

In conclusion, I will simply say that our fellow-worker C. B. Reynolds has been here and favored us with a stirring lecture, which was well received by the audience; and all seemed to regret that his stay must be so short.

I like Brother Reynolds. He hits hard. On the platform he is like a cyclone, and is a holy terror to superstitious people. Socially, he is as gentle and kindly as a girl, and I bespeak for him in the North good audiences and a generous support, which he richly deserves.

To our friends in the field of Freethought we will say, We are now rested up, and will take the warpath next week to open up a campaign in Seattle and points on the Sound and in Oregon, to last three months, returning home in time to vote for the best principles and best men; and then to begin a campaign against the world, the flesh, and the devil, in Leadville, Col., on November 18th, for which we trust that the Leadville friends will hav all things in apple-pie order.

DR J. L. YORK.

Professor Gunning.

The Liberal cause has suffered a great loss in the death of a man of high scientific attainments and rare courage in speaking his uttermost thoughts. His articles in the Index and Open Court were brilliant, crowded with interesting facts, and plainly meant to expose the falsity of such popular sayings, as that the world was created for the benefit of the human race. I remember his saying that it would be a great deal better for us if we could get rid of all the animals, except about one species in five hundred, and a similar proportion of the plants. The great hope for our cause is in the progress of science; but so much of what might be gained thus is lost through the willingness of scientists to compromise with popular prejudice, that we ought to honor deeply the memory of a man who never wavered or hesitated in his loyalty to truth.

Advertise in the Truth Seeker.

In sending money for a renewal of an advertisment running in these columns for several months, an advertiser writes:

"We hav been benefited by the advertisment, calls for our goods coming from far east and west, Australia, etc."

Reading that, it occurs to us that hundreds of Freethinking business men might likewise be benefited if they would advertise their business in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Our terms are very reasonable, and we can find room for all who apply.

The School Question Again.

The removal of a teacher from his duties in a public school and the withdrawal of the text-book which he used, both at the command of the Roman Catholic church, by the Boston school board, has helped on the fight over the public schools wonderfully. The press is discussing the matter vigorously, and more people hav had their eyes opened to the iniquitous aims of Rome. But a more flagrant instance of Roman domination has occurred in Kansas, at a little place called St. Bridget, where the priest seems to rule supreme. Not only does he control the education of the children, but he has removed the schoolhouse closer to his church, and completely transformed the school from a public to a parochial institution. The Catholic catechism is taught by him, and the children are compelled to study it or go home. Several Protestant children hav been expelled because their parents objected to this study, and several families hav moved from the neighborhood in order to obtain suitable educational facilities for the youngsters. The rules adopted by this school are thus summarized by Wm. P. Madden, a Catholic resident of St. Bridget, but an opponent of the parochial school system:

"The rules of the parochial school were often read from the altar by Rev. Timothy Luber. The reading was from a book about the size of a United States history. Rev. Mr. Luber said it was written and printed by the bishop. Of course I do not remember it, but it was somewhat as follows: that the books must be the Catholic books and no other; that the catechism and Catholic prayers must be taught all. Protestant and Catholic children alike must obey the rules, except that when mass is said all the Catholic children must march into church and the Protestant children may not be required to do so; that no man will be a member of the school board except a practical Catholic, and they must keep to the letter of the law, but not to the spirit of the law, so as to obtain the public funds."

And this destruction of our public schools is going on not only in a few places, but almost everywhere in the country, from Boston to the far West. The fight is here, and will be here until the issue is determined. The church is prepared to force it, and no longer aims at concealment of her intentions. In the July Forum, M. Leon Bouland, who recently left the Catholic for the Episcopal priesthood, says:

"The policy of the Roman hierarchy is, for the most part, to work quietly until it shall be ready to assert its authority and enforce its decrees. But, in discussing the public school question, there is no pretense of modesty or toleration. In this one matter, at least, the issue is already clearly drawn. The Roman church will no longer treat with the state upon this subject. She will accept no terms but an unconditional surrender. The orders hav gone forth from the Vatican, and the war upon our public schools has begun."

Commenting upon this announcement by Mr. Bouland, the Christian Union says:

"There will be no compromise; there is no evasion; open, determined, and persistent antagonism to our common school system is henceforth the attitude and policy of the Catholic hierarchy. He who hopes to escape this struggle or to outwit or out-maneuver this foe is already beaten; he does not know the antagonist with whom he is fighting."

And the Observer, though a bigoted Presbyterian journal, sees the issue clearly:

"We shall not ourselvs, at this time, attempt a discussion of the question which has been raised by the Boston school board touching the Roman Catholic doctrin of indulgences. We shall only add here that we thoroughly sympathize with those who hav set up a standard of revolt against Romanist domination in the schools of Boston. Like them, we can but regard the action of the school board as a dangerous precedent, a movement full of peril to our free educational institutions and our religious freedom. We hav to remember that the hostility of the Roman church to our public school system has always been deep and intense, and that it has lost no opportunity to assail it and destroy its influence. We hav to remember also that very recently this hostility has taken to itself a new and added bitterness; that Roman Catholic journals, evidently acting under inspirations from Rome, hav united in new and vigorous denunciation of the public schools, and in appeals to their people to support parochial institu tions. We must, therefore, regard the removal of an obnoxious teacher and text-book from the schools of Boston as a thing not so important in itself, as it is in the fact that it marks the beginning of a train of evils and abuses of power that must surely follow Roman domination in our government. The revolt against such domination cannot begin too soon, and there is no better place for it to begin than in Faneuil Hall."

During the past year THE TRUTH SEEKER has given dozens of other instances of the subversion of public schools, or of their discontinuance to make room for parochial institutions. The war is upon us, and must be fought out. Those who are indifferent now will wake up too late and find the Catholics hav won. It needs earnest, intelligent, vigorous action to thwart Rome, and equally strong endeavor to prevent the Protestants from practically owning the public sources of education. Protestants will be with us to the point of opposing Rome, but the complete secularization of the schools—the only satisfactory and permanent settlement of the controversy—must be accomplished by Liberals. Every Liberal in every school-district in the country should take it upon himself to do what he can to make his school secular. A few schools are already so; but where they are not, protests to the teachers, then to the school boards, and finally action in the courts, are the methods to be employed in most cases.

The coming few years will determin whether our public schools are to be maintained, or whether the Catholics and Protestants will divide our children and our money.

A Miraculous Well.

Over in Brooklyn, at the corner of Hicks and Warren streets, is located a Roman Catholic church, which recently bade fair to be as favorit a place of pilgrimage for invalids as the Lourdes grotto in France. It is not often that miracles are performed in places where the ubiquitous reporter can investigate them, but the City of Churches had a shrine where miracles were as common as potatoes in the tenements of its worshipers. Between the 5th of last June and the fatal day in July when an iconoclastic plumber appeared on the scene, scores of people hav felt the power of God manifested through a holy well.

The story is this: Two moons ago, in the churchyard at the corner of Hicks and Warren streets, Brooklyn, N. Y., U. S. A. (we are particular in identifying the spot in order that skeptics may not say that these miracles occurred far from civilization, where no one could investigate them), water began to deluge the luxuriant grass growing in the sacred place. The water appeared to come from a spring. The matter soon became noised about, and as the water daily increased in volume the parishioners believed that God had sent their good pastor a "holy well." Scores of people flocked to it daily, carrying with them tin pails in which they carried away the miraculous water. Many cures were effected by means of the water. Old ladies suffering from rheumatism and neuralgia found great relief, and many sties were removed from sore eyes after bathing them with the water. The knowledge of these cures came to one of the parishioners, Mrs. Mulvane, whose husband had squandered his earnings in drink for more than a year, and had finally become a habitual drunkard. She thought that probably the water might cure him, and obtaining a quart can of it induced her husband to drink it, telling him at the same time what it was. After drinking the water from the holy well Mulvane suddenly stopped his habits of intoxication and went to work, bringing all of his wages every Saturday night home to his wife and family. No greater proof of the holy nature of the water could be established, and the people in the neighborhood of the church broke down the iron railing in their eagerness to get to the wonderful fluid. Father Fransioli said: "It is the will of almighty God, who has sent me this well as a fountain of gold to pay off the debt of the church." The sexton dug some shovelfuls of earth from the place where the water was, and building a mound around it, gave it the appearance of a bubbling stream. He was about to hav a box built, in which those taking the holy water could deposit contributions, and predicted the church debt of over $100 000 would be paid off in two months. The crowds around the church increased daily, and passage along the sidewalk on Hicks street was impeded by the presence of women praying on their knees before the well. Nor was the belief in its virtues confined to women. Many a laboring man passing the spot would reverently uncover his head, and, after a muttered pious ejaculation, would go on his way. The irreverent, who said the water came from a broken pipe, were called disbelieving beasts, and wonder was expressed that God did not strike them dead.

About a week ago an iconoclastic plumber appeared. Accompanying him was a laborer armed with pick and spade, who began his investigations at once. A score or two of the parishioners, headed by the priest, at once surrounded the spot. As the laborer drove his pick deep into the yielding earth, one old lady said: "Sure it's sacrilege the man is doing." "You'll never hav a day's luck," said another. "Och, never mind yere talk," said a third, "he'll only make the well deeper, and an oratory will be built around it." But the laborer dug away unmindful of the blasphemy he was committing, and soon his shovel grated against an iron pipe, and a ten-inch break was uncovered. "Here's your well," he said most irreverently. "Sure, it's the source of the spring he's struck," said a woman whose belief could not be shaken. Just then a gray-haired woman came to the spot carrying a can beneath her shawl. "Go away, my good woman," said Father Fitzgerald in a sorrowful tone; "it is not a well at all, but only a busted water pipe." "Saving your presence, your reverence," said the woman, "can that be so?" "It is so," said the priest. "Well, well," said the old lady, without any apparent attempt at a pun, "I can scarcely believe it." She gave a long look at the hole, which was rapidly filling with water, and left apparently disconsolate. "That's too bad," said a matter-of-fact old man, who had been watching the digging; "when Mulvane hears of this he'll go on a terrible spree."

So goes another miracle, a source of power and revenue to the church. The cures the water effected were as genuin as the cures at Lourdes or Knock, and it seems a pity that cold skepticism should hav destroyed the wonderful and holy well. But such, alas! is the fate meted out to all miracles nowadays. We do not believe that there is an educated man in the country who would even admit that the dead could come back to life, though twelve hundred apostles asserted it. But for this iconoclastic plumber to ruthlessly expose the source of the Brooklyn old woman's holy well was cruel indeed. And the worst of it is, it will hav a tendency to throw discredit upon accounts of other miraculous cures!

Obscenity Laws.

Mr. E. C. Walker says in his new paper, Fair Play:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER avers that the obscenity laws 'are necessary and right when enacted by state legislatures and enforced by the proper municipal officers.' Then regarding the postal statutes it says:

"'The national law, however, is not only cumbersome and tyrannical in its administration, but under it hav sprung up soc eties of private persons who hav taken upon themselvs the task of enforcing these statutes. This is not in accordance with American ideas. Prosecutions for obscenity should be taken out of the hands of these meddlers and put into the charge of the local authorities.'

"Well, is it not possible, nay, more, probable, that these same 'societies of private persons' will manipulate the 'local authorities' just as they now manipulate the federal officials?

"Again THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"'Another difficulty attending the prosecution of the obscenity laws is the delicate judgment required in deciding what properly comes under the statute.'

"May I inquire, Eugene, if you really believe that these 'local authorities,' these 'municipal officers,' in whom you seem to hav such great faith, are endowed with judgments so much more 'delicate' than those of United States judges and jurymen that they can safely be intrusted with the censorship of American literature and art while the federal judges and jurymen cannot?

"Once more I quote from the paper founded by D. M. Bennett:

"'Again, certain people—narrow and starved in thought, dyspeptic, and fanatically pious—regard with professed horror objects to which educated and traveled people never giv a second thought.'

"Of course none of these 'narrow and starved in thought, dyspeptic, and fanatically pious' people get into municipal offices, none of them are village squires or county justices of the peace! We always make United States judges and jurors out of such people, eh? The United States officials are never traveled or educated persons, these always managing to get into fat local positions. Without question the heretical editors of Lucifer and Fair Play would hav ever so much fairer a trial in a village like Oskaloosa, this county, where the people elected a mayor and council composed entirely of devout Christian women, than they would before an educated United States judge. Of course a censorship is not a censorship when exercised by a local Dogberry! Certainly not, tyranny is tyranny under certain conditions only. If a United States judge (Benedict, for instance) sends you to prison for selling a reformatory pamphlet, it is tyranny. If a country squire sends you to the county jail for doing the same thing, it is 'necessary and right,' and you should be thankful that you hav been enabled to contribute to the glory of the 'local authorities.' Come, come, dear Eugene! Get out of that illogical mire, and never, never again permit the ignis fatuus of statute morality to lure you heels over head into another morass of the kind."

This is very fine and satirical and all that, but nevertheless we hav such a regard for facts that it fails to convince us that we are wrong. In this city some years ago there used to be dealers in real obscene books. Their headquarters were in Nassau and Center streets. One fellow was caught by the local authorities and sent up for a year or two—just about what he deserved. Finally he, or another one—it makes no difference which—was hauled into Benedict's United States court, and got ten years—a punishment much too severe. Our opinion upon this subject of obscenity and its punishment is formed from knowledge of this and other facts, and not upon mere speculation.

The real difference between Mr. Walker and ourself is that he would repeal all obscenity laws, while we would not. Living in a country comparativly free from the pest of obscene publications, and where the reading of children may be easily known, Mr. Walker naturally gets the views he expresses. But in all large cities scoundrels are found who will make money by corrupting the most innocent portion of humanity. Such fellows must be restrained and punished. Individuals cannot do this, and therefore society, through its laws and by means of its regularly constituted police force, must take the matter in hand. The United States government should be restricted to those functions granted it by the Constitution.

Mr. Walker cannot escape these conclusions unless he argues for the right of scoundrels to publish their vile literature unrestricted.

Is Solomon in Hell?

Solomon, if we are to believe what the Bible says of him, was not only the wisest but the most polygamous of mankind. He spoke three thousand proverbs, wrote one thousand and five songs, and had one thousand wives, three hundred of the latter being morganatic. In regard to the writings of Solomon, this is what Smith's Bible Dictionary says:

"Something may be learned from the books that bear his name, which, whether written by him or not, stand in the canon of the Old Testament as representing with profound, inspired insight the successiv phases of his life; something also from the fact that so little remains out of so much, out of the songs, proverbs, treatises, of which the historian speaks (1 Kings iv, 32, 33). Excerpta only are given from the three thousand proverbs. Of the one thousand and five songs we know absolutely nothing. The poems of the son of David may hav been like those of Hafiz. The scribes who compiled the canon of the Old Testament may hav acted wisely, rightly, charitably to his fame, in excluding them."

But it seems that the ancient compilers did not exclude "the Song of Songs which is Solomon's," beginning with, "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth; for thy love is better than wine." We forbear to quote any further from this erotic songbook, out of deference to the Society for the Suppression of Vice. But we venture nevertheless to point out what appears to be an intentional mistranslation in the verse above quoted. The Septuagint reads, "Thy mastoi are better than wine," and the Douay Bible has the same; that is to say, it has the equivalent of mastoi in English, which we forbear to print, in dread of Anthony Comstock.

But there can be no offense in continuing to quote what Smith's Bible Dictionary says about Solomon and his literary work:

"The books that remain meet us, as has been said, as at any rate representing the three stages of his life. The Song of Songs brings before us the brightness of his youth. Then comes, in the book of Proverbs, the stage of practical, prudential thought. The poet has become a philosopher, the mystic has passed into a moralist."

That is to say, the smutty song writer has evoluted into the prosy proverbial philosopher. It is as if Swinburne should become a Tupper.

But we hav not done with the quotation from Smith's Bible Dictionary, according to which Solomon, as a moralist, proves such a failure that he has to be sent to hell at last:

"But the man passes through both stages without being permanently the better for either. They were to him but phases of his life which he had known and exhausted (Eccl. i, 2). And therefore there came, as in the Confessions of the Preacher, the great retribution. Here our survey must end. We may not enter into the things within the veil, or answer, either way, the doubting question, Is there any hope?"

That doubting question is softly put. In plain words it means, Is Solomon in hell?

"Our Friends, the Enemy."

The Independent has compiled a page of statistics giving the numerical strength in churches, ministers, and communicants of the various religious organizations in the United States. For the sake of ascertaining the net gain it also givs the corresponding figures of last year. The figures for 1888 are:

	Chs.	Min.	Com.
Adventists	1,563	835	100,441
Baptists	45,434	30,998	3,971,685
Christian Union	1,500	500	120,000
Congregationalists	4,404	4,090	457,584
Friends	700	500	107,968
German Evangelical Ch	675	560	125 000
Lutherans	7,992	4,215	987,600
Mennonites	385	605	93,000
Methodists	48 258	28,313	4,699,529
Moravians	94	108	10,966
New Jerusalem	95	101	5,750
Presbyterians	13,057	9,585	1,136,685
Episcopalians	4,766	3,931	446,785
Reformed	2,028	1,349	269,523
Roman Catholics	6,829	7,596	7,200,000
Unitarians	375	488	20,000
Universalists	730	677	37,807
Total	138,885	94,457	19,790,323

This indicates a gain since this time 1887 of 6,434 churches, 4,505 preachers, 774,861 communicants, without counting the New Jerusalemites, Christadelphians, Plymouth Brethren, and a few other small sects of semi-lunatics. From these figures the Independent derives much encouragement.

It occurs to us that there is another side to the figures, allowing that they are approximately correct. The Roman Catholic increase naturally comes from immigration and family increase. Without that the net increase was only 574,861 communicants. This is at the rate of 4.35 to every church, 6.6 to every minister, and 1 to every 21 communicants, if the Independent has ciphered rightly. In other words, it has taken a church, nearly a whole minister, and twenty-one church-members to haul four sinners and thirty-five hundredths of another sinner off the coals, supposing the gain to be all from conversions. And what did it cost? Close calculation is impossible, as church expenses vary from tens of thousands for the marble cathedral to hundreds for the backwoods church barn, and the salaries of the preachers run down from Archbishop Corrigan's annual fortune of forty or fifty thousand dollars to the country parson's three hundred and a donation party. Average it up and the expense of a church may be called a thousand dollars, and the preacher's salary another thousand—say two thousand dollars for less than five saved sinners—over four hundred dollars apiece! Miracle of cheapness! pleasing marvel of progress!

Still further. Justice is supposed to be a cardinal doctrin of Christianity. Let's see! We hav 138,885 churches, and some 3,057 Catholic chapels in this country—141,942 edifices untaxed save in California. How much do these rob the people of? Say fifty dollars apiece, though perhaps the estimate should be higher, $7,097,100—pretty big sum to cheat the people out of annually! And nothing said about the church institutions which not only escape taxation, but draw huge sums from state treasuries! And seventeen churches a day building—$850 a day cheating in taxes alone. Cheering for the Christians, no doubt, to see this increase, but it might cheer the tax-payers a little more to see the Christians increase in honesty as well as in numbers.

But giving the Christians their increase, what of it? Go to any non-Christian country whose population is growing, and the same increase of religious edifices and believers will be observed. Mohammedanism is spreading in Africa, and in Asia and Turkey new mosques are building, and additional muezzins call the faithful to prayers. Do these facts prove that there is no God but Allah, and Mohammed is his prophet? The natural increase of any religious sect as numerous as the Christians will account for greater figures than the Independent has given, stretched by "estimates" though they be. Any man with eyes in his face can see that belief in Christianity is waning, and that outspoken skeptics are infinitly more numerous than twenty or even ten years ago. The Christian religion will not go by refusals to build churches or to preach in them, but is going by a gradual transformation of the belief of the people. The Christianity of to-day was the heresy of a generation ago.

Editorial Notes.

THE Jamestown Journal reports that Olean, N. Y., is agitated over the matter of music or no music on Sundays For several Sundays past the Forty-third separate company's band has given concerts in the park in the afternoon, and the excellent selections of sacred and other music hav been listened to by hundreds of men, women, and children each Sunday with pleasure. Four ministers hav issued a proclamation requesting the band to discontinue the concerts, as they "corrupt the morals of the citizens!"

JUDGE SLOVER, of Missouri, has decided that personal property belonging to colleges, charitable institutions, and churches is exempt from taxation as well as the buildings and the grounds upon which they stand. The decision adds another class of property to the exempt list in Missouri, and when the list is extended a little farther the farmers and house-owners will be about the only people with whom the tax-collector will hav business. The whole business of exempting any private property is monstrously unfair, and ought to be stopped. The Christian church can hav the honor of originating this robbery, as she will be last to make restitution.

THE New York Voice, Prohibitionist journal, recently printed this paragraph: "'I hate God and love Gresham,' said Robert G. Ingersoll at Chicago last week, and he was one of the most honored men, the most loudly cheered man, who appeared before that National Republican Convention. Imagin, if you can, a man uttering a sentiment of that kind unrebuked in the presence of Lincoln, or Sumner, or Chase, or even profane Ben Wade. And now this Republican party makes this blatant Infidel one of its chosen leaders at its most representativ convention. How are the mighty fallen!" It is unnecessary to state that the utterance attributed to Colonel Ingersoll never fell from his lips. The reflections following it, therefore, are only a revelation of the bigotry of the editor of the Voice.

IN a political campaign a few years ago in which Colonel Ingersoll took an activ part, the Democratic papers made a great to-do about Infidelity in politics. Speaking of this from Cooper Union platform one night, the colonel said: "I hav made the Democrats pious, pious, pious! And now all the time they get between drinks they spend in quoting scripture." We were reminded of this lately in seeing in the Word and Liberty and other Anarchist papers quotations from TRUTH SEEKER editorials affirming the Jeffersonian doctrins (also Thomas Paine's doctrins) of government. These journals now claim that these are their doctrins also, and the conclusion is more than implied that Anarchy is only Jeffersonianism. We feel exceedingly pleased at this evidence of the good effects of our labors with the fiery "Reds" of Radicalism. If we hav not made them pious we hav made them sensible; and now all the time they get between writing tirades against all government we hope they will spend in reading Jefferson.

THE following is the passage in Swinton's "Outlines of History" which has caused its removal from the Boston schools on the vote of a majority of the school committee, of whom thirteen are Protestants and eleven liberal Catholics: "When Leo X. came to the papal chair he found the treasury of the church exhausted by the ambitious projects of his predecessors. He therefore had recourse to every means which ingenuity could devise for recruiting his exhausted finances, and among these he adopted an extensiv sale of indulgences, which in former ages had been a source of large profit to the church. The Dominican friars, having obtained a monopoly of the sale in Germany, employed as their agent Tetzel, one of their order, who carried on the traffic in a manner that was very offensiv, and especially so to the Augustinian friars. The indulgences were in the early ages of the church remissions of the penances imposed upon persons whose sins had brought scandal on the community. But in process of time they were represented as actual pardons of guilt, and the purchaser of an indulgence was said to be delivered from all his sins." It is an exceedingly mild description of the ridiculous and infamous indulgence trade driven by the church just previous to the Reformation.

Letters from Friends.

POPLAR BLUFF, Mo., July 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to notify friends in southeastern Missouri, northern Arkansas, and southern Illinois, especially Vienna, that I will lecture for them until September 1st for actual expenses of trip there and back. Subsequent to the 1st I purpose taking a trip through Arkansas and spending the winter in Texas, lecturing for Universal Mental Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child. Address,

DR. S. S. HAYDEN,

P.O. Box 44, Poplar Bluff, Butler county, Mo.

SILVERTON, ORE., July 1, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been on the move lately, and was in Silverton last Monday, just too late to hear Putnam. But I saw him, and learned that Clark Braden was following him and bantering and bullying him to debate. But Samuel would not do it, and the Christians think they hav won by default.

I inclose two clippings of late Christian sermons, one by Dr. Holman on "Skeptics," in Minneapolis; the other, "The Mistakes of Bob," by Col. L. F. Copeland, in Portland, Ore.

I notice that the Sabbath-schools hav had the resurrection of Jesus for a lesson, in which they try to harmonize the different accounts in the gospels, and pass lightly what they cannot explain. I go to church sometimes, and hear skeptics and Infidels preached to and about more and more. Straws tell the direction of the currents. The hit bird flutters.

I do not like the emblem of the flag above the cross. Why not as well above the crescent, or any other superstition?

Yours for Freethought, GEORGE F. ELLIOTT.

PAYSON, ARIZ., July 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I think all of the subscribers ought to send in a note, that we might know where our friends are and if they are outspoken. I am looked upon here like Bill Nye's old Indian, "a heap bad man from away back," and yet there are hundreds of Freethinkers here. But we are not organized and are one hundred miles from the railroad. I hav done no little missionary work. I make all the Liberals I can. But I go about in a civil way.

I look upon the Bible as a fraud. In St. Mark xvi, 9, we read: "Now when Jesus was risen early the first day of the week he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils." If Mary had seven devils in her nest there's no wonder why the Jews killed Christ. From what we learn of Mary, she was a frail creature to let the Holy Ghost take her in. That Ghost must be around yet in the big camp-meetings. I think Christ made a great mistake in telling the people he'd come back again on earth during the generation then living. As a prophet he was a failure. Maybe he didn't know the Jews would kill him so dead. The church ought to enlighten us Liberals as to why Christ came not back as he promised. Methinks he'd a good excuse, and that excuse was and is just this—he was a human being and could not come back after his death.

I hav helped our cause all I could. I shall do all I can. I will cease, with love to all brothers of the great cause.

ALFRED HAUGHT.

ALLIANCE, O., July 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I see in your last paper that H. L. Green asks the question, Can an honest Freethinker vote for either Cleveland or Harrison? I, for one, must say that I think he should not. My reasons are, because neither of the old party platforms offers one of the Nine Demands of Liberalism. I think the right way for the Liberals to make themselvs felt in political matters is to come square out and indorse a party that offers some inducement to them; and, in my estimation, the Greenback party comes the nearest to the party of any of them. And still there is a great chance for improvement in it. I shall support this party until we get something that comes nearer to our aims. I think this should be one of the main objects of our next Congress, to make some kind of political move. By so doing we would be more heard and felt. I am in favor of going back to the old name of National Liberal League, and coming squarely out on the political issue, and then we will accomplish something. As to the honesty of either Cleveland or Harrison as far as Liberal principles are concerned, I hav but little faith. I do not see how any Liberal could support Cleveland after the part he took in sending the Constitution to the pope of Rome. That, I say, should debar any man from ever holding any law-making position in this free America. And if Harrison is one of those old blue Presbyterians, woe to the Liberal that would vote for him. He would be worse on a Freethinker than he would on a poor railroad man.

Hoping to see this subject discussed in all of our Liberal journals, and that Liberals will take some action,

Yours for U. M. L., R. G. SMITH.

MAZO MANIE, WIS., July 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received the sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER which you hav kindly sent me. I am so well pleased with it that I hav decided to send you $1.50 as a half-year's subscription. I think the illustrations or cartoons are excellent. And the letters of your numerous correspondents are highly interesting. The whole make-up of the paper could scarcely be much better.

If I write what I honestly think of orthodox religion, I fear that my letter will not find a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER. But I can never know that unless I put it to a test. From at least twenty years of investigations of my own experience, and of observation of other people's experience, I am forced to the conclusion that orthodox religion is the principal cause of all kinds of vice, crime, and insanity.

As I am a subscriber to the American Idea, published at Liberal, Mo., where Professor Leahy founded the first Freethought University, it was a matter of deep regret to me that there was such a radical unfavorable change in conducting that Freethought college. There can be little doubt that the church is the real fountain-head of the unjust and cruel persecution raised against Professor Leahy. Though the church cannot swerve him from his course of being an advocate and leader in the Freethought ranks of the noble and independent-minded, there are others who are much more under the church's force and influence whom it can squeeze and force against him. But I hope that yet a reaction will set in in his favor, and that he will be reinstated in his proper sphere at the head of the Freethought University.

JOHN LEITOH.

PRINCETON, MASS., July 20, Y.L. 16.

MR. EDITOR: J. Hacker's letter in your issue of the 14th inst. moves me to say that The Pleasure Boat, which Mr. Hacker published in Portland, Me., fifteen years or more, was one of the most vigorously radical prints that hav poured hot-shot into the ranks of New England bigotry. Wendell Phillips used to say of the Abolitionists, "We are nothing unless critical." Mr. Hacker is not merely a critic, a negationist; he affirms essential truths; has worked for absolute right for seventy years. As a land reformer he antedates Ingalls, Rowe, Beeny, Day, Weeks, Hume—the glorious old guard of that faith in New York. Free speech, free press, free mails, physiological reform, temperance, woman's rights, negro emancipation, every progressiv movement since 1830, has had him in the front ranks of its activities.

Too many Freethinkers spend their force on church, Bible, God, and other extinct ecclesiasticism, hardly worth the powder. Twenty years ago Mr. Hacker went from priest-ridden Maine to God-damned New Jersey, and his robust work there has helped make it a decent state to liv in; but for such preachers of liberty as Hacker, Reynolds might hav been imprisoned or hanged rather than liberated by Ingersoll's unrivaled eloquence. Unlike most Abolitionists—the old-line lunatics and Anarchists—Mr. Hacker, though eighty-seven years old, is awake to and activ in all living issues—a pillar of fire to light earth's benighted millions in the upward path to ameliorated conditions.

We are always glad to hear from him in the Word office, and sorry we cannot print more of his quickening inspirations. Though it has never been my privilege to see him face to face, I am personally under great obligations to him for the vigorous service rendered by his inspired pen in the struggle for mental liberty vs. the villainous Comstock law which Bennett bravely defied and gave his life to abolish. No matter what R. Gunther or any other California critic may say, many Yankees rise to recognize in J. Hacker one of the conspicuously notable men New England has produced.

Truly yours, E. H. HEYWOOD.

MR. EDITOR: It would be very much more interesting and profitable to all parties to the discussion of tariff and free trade that has found room in THE TRUTH SEEKER columns if each or either party would learn some facts that should be the foundation of their arguments. Even Colonel Ingersoll admits that he does not know whether protection or free trade is best for the laborers; but thinks that the laborers of one country ought to be taxed to prevent those of another country from making too large profits out of them. It seems very strange to me to read Mr. Ingersoll's lectures in favor of Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child, and then read his advocacy of slavery by taxation. I hav read with very great interest the criticisms upon Mr. Perry's article of June 10th, especially that by Mr. Sanford; and if Mr. Sanford will put "Slavery pure and simple" for "tariff or tax" he will understand the true position of every person in this country. If people by stubborn bigotry will forever hang on to the silly superstition that this is a free country and that slavery can exist in spots in a land of liberty, then they should never hope for any better condition, while those who love liberty must learn what constitutes liberty. There can be no doubt or denial that this country separated from England because of taxation, and then its people were such fools in the art of government that they immediately made the same laws and put the same tax upon themselvs to raise the means to be free with. They had not the manly confidence in themselvs to even see that they were thus doing to themselvs what they had rebelled against the older government for doing. And for over a hundred years the greatest and best men in this country hav accepted the fraud and treachery which gave them taxation and slavery for liberty, and even the greatest and best still believe the most contemptible falsehood and superstitiously believe this to be a free country. What hope is there for the poor laborer if the most learned are unable to see the way to freedom? When some of the free thinkers can realize that they are not free, with all their thinking, then they will perhaps think to better purpose—think that as there is not the least need of taxation there must be some other deeper reason for taxation all over the earth—that of a truth, if the government did not tax the people, but should create and issue a legal tender money to pay all government expenses, there would soon be no banks or bankers, no debts, no interest, no war, no vice or crime, no more prisons, jails, or workhouses, no need of the gallows nor of electricity to murder murderers, no more poverty or suffering from want. So long as people cling to the superstition of religion and priestcraft, just so long they must be slaves to the church; and just so long as they believe that they are free and liv under a free government they must continue to be slaves to taxation. How ridiculous it sounds for Englishmen to sing, "Britons never, never can be slaves!" with 250,000 prostitutes in the one city of London and paupers and drunkards so thick that government despairs of all control of them! And how silly it sounds for Americans to sing "Sweet land of liberty" while their friends and children are starving to death for want and committing all manner of crimes for the sake of life and the lives of those they love! Let us hav the good sense to learn the truth that liberty is yet to be gained and appropriated.

J. H. WOOD.

ARAGO, ORE., June 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Putnam has been with us again. He lectured at Myrtle Point, Arago, Coquelle City, Langlois (Curry county), Bandon, and Marshfield. The campaign was conducted under the auspices of the Coquelle River Secular Union, and was withal a success.

It rained about all the time during his visit, and some of his appointments were filled under trying circumstances. The trip from Arago to Coquelle City, a distance of eight miles, was made in a skiff, and it rained hard every inch of the way. Putnam was jolly, and stood the trip well. His stovepipe hat, however, had a forlorn and dejected countenance, and looked as though a few minutes in hell with careful attention would improve it. This trip suggested to me a new mode of baptism. I will giv you my thoughts on the subject. I giv them in a humanitarian spirit, that good may result from the same, therefore I shall not patent the process. Now, then, the object of baptism is to wash out the old sins (creed) to make room for the new, if I understand it correctly, and it is done in some convenient pool or in tanks in the churches. Therefore, when half a dozen or more hav been baptized in the same water, it must be impregnated with considerable sin. Is it, then, not reasonable to suppose that the last ones to use the water may be influenced more by it than by the preacher, and therefore eventually backslide? Is it to be wondered at that so many preachers are chockfull of sin under such influences? To avoid this contaminating influence, I would use the rain-water from above. I would stand the converts barefooted out in a good shower, with the creed written in some ink soluble in rain-water suspended over their heads, and leave them out a sufficient length of time to secure a good job. It may require a few experiments first to determin the length of time necessary. Reason, however, dictates that it would somewhat depend on the shower and the quality of the ink used.

You will, no doubt, see the beauty of the new process. There need be no officiating preacher even. Anyone could do it. It is gradual, not sudden. As the rain washes the new creed in from above, the old one would hav to succumb and gradually settle, until it settled in the ground. Gravity would help it; therefore a sitting position is in no case to be allowed. It might be bad on crops, but it would save the preacher.

The night Putnam lectured at Langlois the surf filled up the mouth of Flous creek with sand, causing the low lands to overflow; therefore the next day on his way to Bandon he passed through water three-quarters of a mile with his feet on the dashboard and his bundle of dynamite in his lap. They say the way of the transgressor is hard, but I say unto you that the way of the Infidel in Coos county in June, 1888, was uncommonly soft.

The Coquelle River Secular Union met at Bandon on the 15th inst. in the afternoon, before the lecture. Mr. Putnam was present at the meeting. He was tendered the chair, and presided part of the time. He talked to the Union about the necessity and wants of the national organization, and the Union pledged $20 or more for next year's work.

Putnam is a zealous worker. To hav such come among us givs new impulse to those weak in the cause and food for thought to others. The preachers who attended the lectures are agreeably disappointed. They did not hear what they expected from an Infidel.

We will hav the Blasphemer with us in August, and look forward to another good time. Yours for the cause,

J. HENRY SCHROEDER.

MR. EDITOR: Again I send you greeting across the continent, three thousand miles or more. I am agreeably surprised to find THE TRUTH SEEKER in so many homes in this far-away corner. It is doing a mighty work. Heston's cartoons are hitting old orthodoxy most terrible blows, just under the ear, and with those watch-dogs of freedom, Putnam, Reynolds, Jamieson, Remsburg, Washburn, Watts, and a host of others surrounding the old hog of superstition, it ought not to be long before we hav her "corraled," and in the not far off "round up" "lassoed," slaughtered, and buried so deep that she will never be heard of more. All civilization is suffering from priest and pope craft; too much hell; too many devils—calling themselvs "called of God to preach." We know nothing and can know nothing of this ideal being. He, she, or it is but the result of fancy, created by the imagination to answer the question, Who is the creator of all we see? Early man in barbaric conditions could not conceive the idea that our glorious old Sol painted the rainbow upon the clouded sky, or that the rumbling thunder was not the voice of an angry god, but simply the report of the concussion made as the electric flash made its rapid transit from a positiv to a negativ cloud. If man in primitiv ages could hav been scientific, and hav known that all the phenomena that he witnessed in nature were but the manifestation of force through matter, it would hav saved the world from being cursed from pole to pole by an army of gods or one big giant God. Oh, the billions of lives it has cost and the trillions of money spent when men hav raved of Gods! Think of all the past—a religious dream, the martyrs slain, the nations despoiled, crushed, and wiped out in the name of religion and for the glory of God. Think of the millions of desolated homes of love and affection. Think of the long years, centuries, ages, of bloodshed, of agony supreme, all to establish "Thus saith the Lord." Is it any wonder that Agnostics and Infidels are numbered by the million? As the race becomes more educated, more able to reason and philosophize, and understand the "procedure of nature," and as it more and more reads the long black record of the church and the histories of all religions, the greater will grow its unbelief. It is a wonder indeed that any educated man or woman can be a Christian and believe in the he, she, or it God. All the miracles, so-called, above or on earth—all that is attributed to God and the angels—when understood is as simple as evaporation and rainfall. But, says the Christian, who but the creator God made the law that would cause the water to rise from the earth when the sun kissed the earth with amorous warmth, and to become condensed when it struck a colder current of air above and thus be returned to earth by the law of gravitation? We answer: No God in that, or necessity for one. These laws—if laws they can be called—always were; time, space, matter, always existed, so these qualities, conditions, and attributes always hav been. There never has been a time but when worlds hav been forming, suns growing, moons phasing, lightning glimmering, thunder reverberating, rainbows arching, dewdrops falling, constellations circling, and so ad infinitum. No need for a God anywhere. Creation, or rather formation, always has been, always will be, taking place. Throw away the Bible and all other so-called holy books. Let the Gods and devils go to whence they came—the back brain of the wild, unlettered savage. Study nature and nature's methods. Let the lamp of reason shine from the window of the mind. Believe there is nothing in the universe superior to man. Make no prayers and ask no favors, for they indicate slavery, but face the music of the spheres like true men, ever seeking to make humanity happier, wiser, kinder, more loving and tender, and the future will take care of itself. God needs no advice or help from man, and man needs no redemption, only to evolute himself out of his ignorance of nature's methods of procedure. Man is not yet created. He is yet the rough diamond, and must polish himself, must work on, work ever, to finish himself, to in fact become a man—with the selfish passions and appetites all under control of his intellect. Then will the perfect man be born, and this world be the paradise, the garden of Eden. This world is good enough, only let us eat of the tree of knowledge and liv ever true to our highest aspirations. D. C. SEYMOUR.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: A dissentient from Freethought doctrin, Mr. J. H. Ohlhausen, of Neosho, Mo., who writes in plain, forcible English, in a letter published in your issue of the 7th inst. says: "I do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, neither am I in sympathy with its doctrins and views. One of my neighbors takes it, and he kindly givs me the privilege of perusing its columns. To-day he sent me No. 22, of Vol. XV, and calls my attention to the Joplin letter, which I read with care. I fail to detect anything new or grand in the writer's views, but simply a repetition of the Infidel's text which they would hiss into the ears of all Christians, crying, 'Calvin, Servetus! Calvin, Servetus!' as though all Christians were Calvin in person and all parties who suffer wrong were indeed Servetuses."

This quotation opens up a field for profitable discussion which cannot be exhausted in a short letter. A few remarks, however, in the line of thought it suggests may not be amiss. I am not of those who would introduce coarseness, vulgarity, or vituperation into religious or any other kind of discussion. They tend neither to convince nor to convert. I remember the day when I was as orthodox as the devils who believe and tremble, and I was just as honest then as now. I remember, also, how I was shocked when that which I revered as sacred was assailed by taunts and jeers. I do not refer to good-natured sarcasm, however cutting; nor to seemly wit, however pungent, when tipped and tempered by logic. I liked the wholesome smart, the caustic inflicted, even when it made me wince. I recall the struggle through which I passed, and the slow degrees by which I emerged from the chrysalis state, and I am not certain but I wear a fragment of shell on my back at the present time. But to the subject. Why do Infidels refer so often to the burning of Servetus and to kindred examples of Christian cruelty? There are two reasons. 1. Because such inhuman acts are the logical result of Christian doctrin, which is, or professes to be, founded upon scriptural teaching and example. 2. Because of the minor persecutions which to-day are visited upon dissentients from the orthodox faith. I say minor persecutions, for severer penalties than baseless aspersions, business boycotting, and social ostracism, religionists, in free and enlightened communities, are not able to inflict. The spirit which once lighted the torch of persecution still burns, but too dimly to ignite the fagots of the zealous bigot with which he once was wont to consume the hapless martyr to truth and conscience.

The monster intolerance still growls, but Freethought has muzzled the beast, and it can no longer bite. In justice, let it be said that the most bigoted in this country and age would scarcely think of inflicting torture and death as a penalty for unbelief. Freethought, by its benign and ennobling influences, has permeated Christian sentiment and imbued it with more than Christian charity. In the past, men were logical and consistent, even if cruel and unrelenting. The heresiarch was worse than the thief or murderer, and was punished with greater severity. Now men are better than their faith. They hav a religion of the head and a religion of the heart, and the two are in direct antagonism with each other. The one breathes out threatenings and slaughter; the other peace and good-will to all—even to Infidels. We Freethinkers do not charge all Presbyterians with being John Calvins, but we do say that John Calvin, by burning Servetus, carried out his doctrins to their logical consequences, and that he was far more consistent than those who bear his name and profess his creed. We do protest against a religion the spirit and teachings of which, when exemplified in practice, lead to results which appall even its professors. True, its professors are not as bad as they might be, nor as were those who left them the heritage of faith to which they cling, but in lesser degree they are tainted by those effete dogmas which they profess in theory, but ignore in practice.

Will it be said that we liv no longer under the law, but under the gospel, and that the barbarities of the Old Testament are repugnant to the spirit and teachings of the New Testament? Alas! the New has indorsed and commended the Old. They both together constitute the "inspired volume"—the Protestant Christian's "infallible rule of faith and practice." They must both stand or fall together.

W. B. LACY.

SALT LAKE CITY, July 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 16th last there appears a communication from Salt Lake City signed W. Wellock, with an accompanying document which was sent to Dr. J. L. York while lecturing in this city, asking the discontinuance of some objectionable features of the doctor's lectures as seen by some of the leading members of the Union here. I had expected to see a reply from some of the parties Mr. Wellock refers to, but they evidently do not think it worthy of notice, and being a neutral party and somewhat conversant with the matter referred to, I beg your indulgence while attempting to correct some misstatements in the letter of Mr. Wellock. There appears to be a kind of rivalry between the friends of Mr. Putnam and the friends of Dr. York here, judging from Mr. Wellock's letter, which is entirely new to me and doubtless to many others here. That Mr. Putnam is a little gushy is conceded, but this is his style, and is, in my judgment, no serious objection to the man; but it was through Mr. Putnam's efforts that Dr. York came here to fill the engagement of three months last winter, which shows that Mr. Putnam was quite anxious to push the work along.

When Dr. York came here the members of the Secular Union agreed to furnish the Opera House for the course of lectures at $70 a month, the doctor agreeing to accept as his compensation the contributions at the door, which proved to be quite satisfactory to him. But the very parties who were contributing for the rent of the Opera House were also the most generous in contributing toward the support of Dr. York, and I cannot see why Mr. Wellock should come out with such a tirade of abuse against the parties he refers to in his communication. I cannot see how anything but disaster can follow such a course, and it will need a different class of men altogether than Mr. Wellock to make anything succeed. Dr. York is a very powerful speaker, and during his course of lectures here the Opera House was crowded up to the very last meeting. Some went because of their devotion to the cause, many from curiosity, and some, like Mr. Wellock, to hear "the dry bones of orthodoxy rattle." And I am quite satisfied that all got a taste of what they went for. There is a class of thinkers, however, who are long since tired of abusing people because of a difference of opinion, and they think there is sufficient in the platform of Secularism to interest any thoughtful person if properly presented. Christian people generally are just as honest as we are, and to convince them that they are in error it is not always necessary to knock them down. There was doubtless a time in our own history when we also believed in the absurdities of the church, and we were probably as honest then as we are to-day, and should be thankful that we now see and know better. I do not agree with Mr. Wellock that every "preacher or priest knows he is a fraud," and regard such a statement as exceedingly wild. The document sent to Dr. York as a gentle protest against the use of slang, mimicry, etc., speaks for itself; and if any of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will take the pains to read it over again, they will find little in it to complain of. And had the doctor taken it in a friendly way it would hav been much better for all parties. To publish it in THE TRUTH SEEKER was not, I think, a friendly act to Dr. York. Mr. Wellock's reference to the officers of the Secular Union here does not, in my humble opinion, do him much credit. Speaking of the president, W. S. Godbe, as a defunct seer and revelator, might suit some people like Mr. Wellock, but the more thoughtful are inclined to regard such insults as anything but gentlemanly. Mr. Godbe is a gentleman of high standing in this community—generous to a fault, always ready to do a kind act, and always ready to defend the rights of others, however much they may differ with him. Mr. Godbe, Mr. H. W. Laurence, and a few others hav spent a fortune in the Liberal cause in this territory, and hav ever been in the front ranks in all advance measures. No wonder they treat with silent contempt such rubbish as that given by Mr. Wellock. I believe the statement that the petition was presented to orthodox churchmen to sign to be positivly untrue, as is also the statement that those names without an asterisk which were affixed to the petition to Dr. York belonged to any orthodox church. I know every signer except two or three, and not one of them belongs to any church, but they are Liberal-minded men in every sense.

The statement that the Secular Union gave up the Opera House is intended by Mr. Wellock to convey the idea that because Dr. York repudiated the protest the officers of the Union gave up the hall, attempting to turn the doctor out, etc. Now, the truth is that the party from whom the Opera House was leased notified the Secular Union that twelve nights completed the contract, and the latter, presuming that he was correct, regarded the course of lectures as completed. They naturally returned the piano, which was only rented, and also notified the lady soloist. Dr. York, however, who had been doing quite well financially, wanted another night, and argued that he wanted thirteen nights instead of twelve, and he and some friend made arrangements for one more night. This difference was merely the result of a misunderstanding, and not the result of any quarrel. But a reading of Mr. Wellock's letter would impress a stranger with the idea that there was a great disruption here among the Liberals, while such is not the case. We think Dr. York a very useful man in the Liberal ranks, and we would like to see him succeed and prosper, but cannot help thinking that his usefulness would be greatly augmented by giving a little heed to the suggestions offered in the document referred to above. The signers of it hav nothing but the kindliest feelings toward him, and thought it for his own good and the good of the cause, or they would not hav made them at all. We hardly think the advocacy of the doctor's cause by Mr. Wellock has added anything to his importance, and hardly think Dr. York would hav sanctioned its appearance in THE TRUTH SEEKER had he known it beforehand.

SELMA.

BROOKLYN, July, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: When the old Christian faith had received sufficient enlightenment through the more radical denominations of Universalism, Unitarianism, and Swedenborgianism, to say nothing of the outside Liberal movement, it seemed fitting that a final or culminating effort should be made, which would not only bring phenomenal facts to prove the truth of the old faith, but establish the actual knowledge of the new, or scientific one.

Facts, so-called "miracles," or spiritual phenomena hav ushered in all religions, in order to gain the attention of mankind and draw them away from the lusts of the flesh to a study of the infinit. So it was with Christianity; so it is with Spiritualism to-day, except that we hav not as yet reached a grade of miracle comparable as a whole with those performed by Jesus the Christ, or master medium.

Some of these recorded phenomena still seem impossible in the light of reason, though the underlying principles of a major part seem undeniably presented in these latter days. Man first swallows whole his prescription for salvation at the hands of the church, then under the fire of these outside influences he begins to think, and thinking begins to doubt—and doubting either leaves the old and beaten track for a more liberal faith or else, if conservativ in his nature, hangs on and demands more of his pastor.

Thus strong outside influences are brought to bear upon the old storm-beaten ship, which tend to round off her angles through reaction and attrition; so that, while the "come-outers" tend toward a general and special erratic individuality of thought and life, the stanch adherents become more and more enlightened and Liberalized, as the new thought comes to them carefully strained, or sifted, through the mind of their presiding pastor. These become neither "cranks" nor reformers, but they owe what they are in their balance and more Liberal thought to those they dub by such names.

All these movements, except that founded upon the experiences of Emanuel Swedenborg and our own later one based upon the universal facts offered through our mediums, depended upon the growth of reason for their development; the others came through revelation—came through history repeating itself in modern times—came because the time was ripe and God was ready to grant man's prayer for light. How can man understand revelation except through its counterpart, or second coming, in modern times? Jesus said, "I hav many things to tell you, but ye cannot bear them now;" "Let not your heart be troubled. Ye believe in God: believe also in me; for in my father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go to prepare a place for you, I will come again by and by, that where I am, there ye may be also." At what time could man be more ready for this knowledge than now, when the great body of humanity is so generally enlightened, and the general situation so suggestiv of transition and the need of divine rather than human wisdom so patent, in order to prop erly adjust it?

Forty years of Spiritual work hav prepared the mind of man for still stronger truths than he has yet received and for the fulfilment of Bible prophecy.

Liberalism and Rationalism can pull to pieces and tear down all that seems contrary to human reason at its present plane, but it was left for another despised spiritual movement to complete the last link in the religious chain, and show what revelation, miracles, men of God, seers, prophets, oracles, etc., really were. It has come and spread as quietly as a thief in the night. It has disintegrated ideas and people. It has done harm; it has done good. But it has come to stay, and to grow stronger and stronger as it waxes older and its people wax more united and harmonious.

The "Christ spirit" is being taught again throughout the length and breadth of the movement. Its practice is gaining, and the cause only lacks a recognized head—a divinely appointed medium and mediator as well, to ultimately throw each follower on his own responsibility for his own salvation through personal growth and unfoldment.

It has been said, or given through a medium, that if Jesus of Nazareth ever did come again "in clouds of great glory," it would be through a medium who would be raised up "in the last days" and who would represent him as an "outward visible sign of an inward spiritual grace," if I may use the term.

In place of overthrowing the true church entirely, it would seem as if Spiritualism was really a final proof of its true beginning—a beginning free from forms and ceremonies, where communism, a pure life, and sacrifice of self rather than of animals, of the animal in man rather than out of him, predominated.

That Bible prophecy is being fulfilled, and so the Bible substantiated, I hav not the slightest doubt. It only remains for time to prove the full meaning of so mighty a movement as this, ushering in as it does a new dispensation at the same time that it closes an old one—an age of reason, of science, and of general revelation through mediums—an age in which the highest type of the individual will be a truly balanced mind in a well-developed body. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Listen, Boys.

Whatever you are, be brave, boys!
The liar's a coward and slave, boys;
Though clever at ruses,
And sharp at excuses,
He's a sneaking and pitiful knave, boys!

Whatever you are, be frank, boys!
'Tis better than money and rank, boys;
Still cleave to the right,
Be lovers of light,
Be open, above-board, and frank, boys!

Whatever you are, be kind, boys!
Be gentle in manner and mind, boys;
The man gentle in mien,
Words, and temper, I ween,
Is a gentleman truly refined, boys!

But whatever you are, be true, boys!
Be visible through and through, boys;
Leave to others the shamming,
The "greening" and "cramming,"
In fun and in earnest, be true, boys!

The Everglades.

The portion of Florida south of latitude 28° is called the Everglades. This, excepting a small portion near the eastern coast, is mostly an extensiv swamp or marsh, interspersed with many shallow lakes, which are connected by a network of narrow water channels. The land is covered with a luxuriant growth of vegetation. During the rainy season between June and October the musketoes become so numerous that stock weary almost to death fighting these poisonous insects.

Among the Everglades, and especially along the western border, are several sandy islands sufficiently elevated above high water to be extensivly cultivated. During February, 1888, I visited many of them, and saw several schooners making their bi-weekly trips to collect the products. Cabbages, beans, cucumbers, and egg-plants were being packed for Northern markets. On one island I saw a banana plantation of thirteen acres. Every tree was maturing a bunch of this delicious and wholesome fruit.

On the countless number of islands and islets not capable of cultivation are many species of trees and plants, pines, cypresses, and mangroves predominating.

Mangroves grow to a medium size, and from their branches air-roots grow downward, forming an impassable jungle.

Florida is called "the Land of Flowers." This name seemed to be a misnomer until I saw the Everglades, where the towering trees, with their hoary crowns of Spanish moss—the cactus with its golden bloom, the cocoanut, and royal palms—send their feathered leaves above the great variety of plants and flowering shrubbery to be kissed by the genial sun—every tree, plant, and flower hav individually and collectivly traits of surpassing beauty—and where the move of every leaf, the bud, fruit, or flower of every plant, is an illustration of some beautiful law, or the process of evolution in the kingdom of nature.

Immortality.

Theology used to teach that the body was the thing that was resurrected. But science proved that to be an impossibility, so they found a nothing in the body and called it a soul. But if men hav souls, why hav not animals? Man is but an animal. Every scientist now believes that man is the top link in a chain which has for its bottom the soft, jelly-like animal called the mollusk. If this is so, at what time did man come to hav this something that no one can describe, called spiritual nature? During the Stone age there roamed the world a being half man, half brute; his body covered with hair; unable to speak; in the habit of eating his children, or even his wife. This creature is the animal now called man. Did he hav a soul? The fact is that the idea of immortality is born of love. When the human race had advanced far enough to love anything, hope, born of love, would whisper to them: "You need not weep. She whom you hav lost is now living in a place where pain and sorrow never come." But stern fact does not giv us any reason to hope. They who are dead are forever dead. The different elements that composed the body hav all gone to the atmosphere. When a sweet odor of flowers pleases your taste, you are then seeing, smelling, and feeling all the dead that hav grown tired of life and lain down to pleasant dreams.

There is but one God—your mother. Any child that treats his mother rudely, that abuses his sister, is not a young Liberal. Sooner than giv any woman any pang of pain, suffer your right arm to be torn from your shoulder. Liv rightly, and when you come to die, and are dead, you will liv forever in the heart of man. R. E. TOUNSLEY.

Correspondence.

SALEM, NEB., July 17, 1888.

MISS SUSAN WIXON: Every Secularist should be proud of the victory won by the brainy children in Chicago. Liberty to think and act develops all powers, and makes beautiful the individual who livs in accordance with its principles. The glory of the coming dawn depends on the freedom of youths from the chains that bind their minds and bodies.

Let us strive to win all of the prizes, and thereby hasten the glory of Secularism.

Children, let us not only think, but act, act. T. P. BRINEGAR.

DAVENPORT, July 12, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As it is raining to-day, I thought I would write a letter to the Corner. The crops look nice this year. The railroad is coming this way right past our house onward to the Columbia river, and onward to Puget sound. Our school closes this week, and I will hav to help my father haying. I am pleased to read your articles in the Corner, as well as the letters from the children. Father has promised us your "Apples of Gold" before long. Wishing you success, I remain, Your Freethinker friend,

NELSON SELDE (aged twelve).

DAVENPORT, IA., July 12, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I saw no letters in the last paper, I thought you were running short. We sent to San Francisco for Putnam's, Macdonald's, and Ingersoll's photographs, and just received them. We all think they are very nice.

I think Si Slocum's pieces about the Badger boy are good. Please tell me where I can get "Apples of Gold," for I want to get it. I already hav "The Story Hour," and I think if I get "Apples of Gold" I will be right.

Yours truly, HENRY SELDE.

["Apples of Gold" can be procured from THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, or of the editor of the Children's Corner. Price, $1.25. —ED. C. C.]

CAMERON, MO., July 15, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I saw my last letter in print, I thought I would write again. I like the Children's Corner; but I think it would be nicer if you would hav a paper with the Children's Corner altogether. I would subscribe for it. I correspond with one of THE TRUTH SEEKER girls, ten years of age. School is out, and harvest begins to be busy. We hav bound wheat, rye, and part of the oats. We hav mowed part of the timothy. We hav had such wet weather for a while; but we had a dry spell too. Last night it rained. It has been very hot for about a week. I spent a hot day on the Fourth of July. I would like to hav one of your pictures if you hav any to spare, and I will giv you one of mine when I get one. This is all for this time. Yours affectionately,

MARY LIVENGOOD.

OAK MILLS, KAN., July 1, E.M. 288.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I expect you are beginning to think I bother you, with so many letters; but if you will accept this one, I will not bother you again for a while. I read in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER an article from the New York World entitled, "Colonel Ingersoll and His Family." It is a true and interesting description of that happy household. No one can read it without feeling that Colonel Ingersoll's life has been a pure and honest one—that he has made the world better for having lived in it. His devotion to his family, his kindness to his many friends, his honest and able thoughts in behalf of his party and his creed, and his good work for the welfare of all humanity, make Robert G. Ingersoll one of the grandest types of a pure manhood that America ever produced. There cannot be enough good said for him. He is a good, square, honest, upright man; a tender, loving, and affectionate husband and father; "a friend in need, and a friend indeed." As an orator he has never been surpassed for eloquence and keen logic. As a lawyer he is truthful, and to-day is the equal of any lawyer in New York city. This is my humble estimate of that grand statue of purity and nobility, Robert G. Ingersoll.

I am glad to see the "J. Hacker Fund" increasing in amount, but sorry to think that it increases so slowly.

I hav been reading some good books lately; also take great pleasure in reading the valuable articles which adorn the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator each week. Aunt Elmina's article on "Kindness and Truth," in the last TRUTH SEEKER, was very good.

The Republican convention at Chicago on June 19th was opened with a prayer by Rev. Frank Gunsalus. He "thanked the Lord for the intelligence and courage under which the banners of the Republican party had gone forth." Instead of thanking the Lord, why did he not thank the noble men who hav carried the Republican banners with such "intelligence and courage?" They and not the Lord deserve the praise. It was very foolish, anyhow, to open a convention with prayer. If it had been opened with a good, sensible speech by Colonel Ingersoll, Senator Ingalls, Chauncey Depew, or some other able speaker, it would hav looked better. Religion and politics should not mix. For, as General Grant said, "Keep church and state forever separate." I do not care for religion just so it stays to itself and doesn't interfere with the politics of our country.

As my letter is getting rather long, I will not detain you any longer; but wishing you success and prosperity through life, and hoping for a continuation of the Corner, I remain faithfully, Your Liberal Friend,

GEO. J. REMSBURG.

[A letter from George is always welcome. We regard him as one of our brightest and best correspondents, and we hope to hear from him often.—ED. C. C.]

Eunice Corners Her Mamma Nicely Without Trouble.

Little Eunice, between three and four years old, had to be punished one day, her mother prefacing the operation with the remark that she was sorry to do it, she only did it because she loved her so much, etc. At night, after the little girl was in bed, she called her mother to her, threw her arms around her neck, and said: "Mamma, we love one another, don't we?" "Yes, dear." "You don't like to punish me, do you?" "No, I do not." "You would rather punish your own self, wouldn't you, mamma?" "Yes." "Well, then, mamma, I wish you would."

He Wanted One.

A small boy was following and nagging a big boy on Columbia street the other day when the big boy halted and said:

"Say, boy, if you foller me any farther I'll black your eye!"

"Will you?"

"You bet!"

"Real black?"

"Awful black!"

"Then I'll foller. If I get a black eye I won't hav to go to school for a week!"

A Dust Item.

"Pa," asked a speculativ youngster, "was I made of dust?"

"Certainly, my son; we all were."

"Just common road dust like that ragged boy out there?"

"Y-e-s," admitted the puzzled father, "just the same. Why do you ask?"

"Oh, I thought maybe as I was such a nice little boy I might be made of diamond dust."

A Figure of Speech.

Fond Mother: "And so you saw a little black baby, Ethel? And what did it look like?"

Ethel: "Oh, so funny, mamma! It was black outside; when it rolled up its eyes and showed its little teeth, then I saw it was white inside. Guess a black baby is just like —a—cream chocolate."

What He Does.

Yes, my son, you are right. A "tariff reformer" is a man that spends one-fourth of his time in denying that he is a free trader and the other three-fourths howling for free trade.—Detroit Tribune.

What It Is to Hav One Wife.

Johnny: "Mamma, is it bigamy for a man to hav two or three wives at the same time?"

Mamma: "Yes, my dear."

Johnny: "Then is it smallamy when he has only got one?"

A Large Moon.

Teacher: "Tommy, about how large should you say the moon was?"

Tommy: "'Bout the size of the punkin that pa took first prize on at last state fair."

"MAMMA, dear," said little Alice, "Charlie and I hav been playing husband and wife." "How did you go about it, dear?" "Well, first, I laid the table, and then we sat down. Charley tasted a dish and threw his napkin down, saying, 'This dinner is only fit for a dog to eat.' Then I told him he was a fool, and then he swore, and then I got up and called him a brute, and he swore again, and I left the room."

"IT is queer," said Mrs. Spriggins, "that when you are looking for a thing you always find it in the last place you look."

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Religious Problems,

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Decease of a Freethinking Judge.

From the Kansas City, Mo., Times.

Judge Arnold Krekel, who has been in failing health for over a year past, died at 2:15 o'clock July 14th. On that day he experienced a severe chill, and failed rapidly thereafter. His passing away was peaceful and painless; and at his bedside at the final moment were his grief-stricken wife and daughters.

Judge Arnold Krekel was one of the oldest federal judges in the country, both in age and in the length of time he had served upon the bench. He was born near Langenfeld on the Rhine in Prussia, seventy-three years ago, and came to this country with his parents in 1832 and had since resided in Missouri, where his father settled. Before emigrating he had received a village school education, to which he added three years of instruction in St. Charles College. Among other studies, he took up mathematics, and at an early age became a surveyor. He was once a United States deputy surveyor and was twice elected county surveyor of St. Charles county. In 1842 he was elected a justice of the peace, and soon after began the study of law. He was admitted to the bar in 1844, and shortly thereafter was elected county attorney, an office he held a number of years. In 1850 he established the St. Charles Democrat, and was for a considerable time its editor. In 1852, Mr. Krekel, still a young man, was elected to the Missouri state legislature, and while a member of that body voted for the first railroad appropriation granted by this state. When the civil war broke out he enlisted in the home guards of St. Charles county, out of which he organized a regiment for actual service. He was elected a colonel, and served throughout the Rebellion. He was a member of the constitutional convention of 1865, became its president, and Feb. 11, 1865, signed the ordinance of emancipation, by which the slaves of Missouri were set free. It was while the constitutional convention was in session that President Lincoln appointed him one of the federal judges. His was one of the last names sent to the Senate by the martyred president. The western district of Missouri, to which he was assigned, had then but one division, court being held at Jefferson City. In 1879 the district was divided, and he moved to this city, which had been made one of the places of holding court.

While at Jefferson City Judge Krekel took a leading part in the organization of a colored school, and in 1866, together with Colonel Foster, organized the present Lincoln Institute. When Colonel Foster removed from Jefferson City the institute was left in charge of Judge Krekel and a few other well-wishers. The judge stood by it with time and means, and for ten years lectured free of charge to the normal classes of the institute on civil government and political economy, delivering on an average one hundred lectures a year.

The lawyers of Kansas City all speak in the highest terms of Judge Krekel's ability. He has made a name, they say, which will exist as long as law. Some of his decisions hav taken rank as authority, and hav been accepted as final. Noteworthy among these hav been his decisions in cases of bankruptcy. Bankruptcy was his specialty, and it is said that the bankrupt law as it exists to-day is more the result of Judge Krekel's work than of any other judge in the country. In all bankruptcy cases his decisions were accepted as a finality, and there was no thought of an appeal. The members of the bar here say that his rulings were always marked by strong common sense and a disregard of technicalities that would tend to interfere with justice. In hearing a case he endeavored to discover, as nearly as possible, the equity of the proceedings and to make his rulings accordingly. He hated pettifogging, and had no patience with the legal niceties which endeavor to make the law a medium of injustice. In his court the client with the right on his side always came out ahead. At the time of his appointment to the district judgeship Judge Krekel had amassed considerable property, being worth about $100,000, but this had all vanished, and during his later years he was entirely dependent upon his salary. He first married in 1843 Miss Ida Krugg, daughter of Dr. Krugg, formerly of Bavaria. She died in 1870. In November, 1880, he married Mrs. Mattie Parry, who survives him, together with five children by his first marriage.

Judge Krekel preserved his interest in current events up to almost the very moment that the angel of death beckoned him to the great beyond. As freely as his strength would permit he would talk with his wife, and asked frequently concerning political as well as civic affairs, commenting upon what he heard and evincing an eager desire to know what was going on in the great world that had passed beyond his reach. He seemed pleased with the appointment of Judge Phillips as his successor, and so expressed himself several times. Occasionally in his moments of delirium he would forget that he had resigned his position. He would imagin himself once more in the court-room facing wrangling lawyers and impatient jurymen. Again juries were impaneled and discharged, cases tried and argued. Then with a weary look he would turn his face toward his wife and say: "Mamma, I am not strong enough; it wearies me. I shall hav to resign." When reminded that he had already taken that step, he seemed surprised for a moment, then with a glance of seeming relief would say, "Ah, yes, so I hav."

Although Judge Krekel suffered from chronic inflammation of the bladder, the physicians attribute his demise to general debility resulting from his advanced age.

The dead jurist fully realized that his end might be near, and he spoke of it several times to his still hopeful wife. He requested her not to wear mourning, saying that death was as natural as birth, and that the emblems of mourning were unnecessary and useless. He was very averse to much ceremony, and requested that the last rites be as simple as possible. Although of Catholic antecedents, Judge Krekel was a pronounced Agnostic, and his children and immediate relativs hold Liberal religious views.

Death of George E. Hartley.

From a Turners Falls, Mass., paper.

On Friday, Mrs. George E. Hartley received a telegram from Gainesville, Florida, announcing the death of her husband there, from typhoid fever. Mr. Hartley came to Turners Falls when the village started, and was a contractor here for many years. He first built the brick house at the Greenfield end of the suspension bridge, but, through a flaw in the title of the land, he refused to keep the place. He then began to buy building lots in what is known as Hartleyville, on L street, and erected comfortable houses to rent, until finally he had ten or a dozen houses in that vicinity. Led off with the smooth tongue of a Florida speculator, he invested in that perpetually boomed state, and went down there to clear up and work a large tract of land which he hoped to parcel out in lots to Eastern people, and reap a sizable fortune. His hard work in that hot climate was too much for even his strong constitution. Mr. Hartley was a big-hearted man, liable to be a little stubborn, and he would go to the ends of the earth to help a friend or punish a foe, and it is a question which he enjoyed most. He knew not the word fear, and his superior bravery won him many medals and other tokens from life-saving societies for his skill and endurance and pluck, in saving lives of shipwrecked sailors, when he was a sailor on a merchantman, often risking his own life as though it were a bubble compared with the struggling souls on the boundless sea; which characteristic of his life brings to mind John Hay's thought:

> He saw his duty a dead-sure thing,
> And went for it there and then,
> And Christ ain't a-going to be too hard
> On a man that dies for men!

Mr. Hartley leaves a wife—a superior business woman—who has had the management of his extensiv property here for a year or two.

A New Book.

From the Sunday Gazetteer, Denison, Tex.

The Truth Seeker Publishing Co., of New York city, has favored the Gazetteer with a copy of a handsome volume just published by them, entitled, "The Universe Analyzed," by John R. Kelso, A.M. Colonel Kelso is not unknown to literary fame. He is the author of several volumes which hav had a good circulation, and has earned a favorable reputation with those of the Ingersoll school of thought as an Antichristian polemic. He is a fine reasoner, and expresses himself in language terse and forcible.

It has occurred to us in reading this last production of Colonel Kelso's pen, that he has attempted to "analyze" a subject a little too extensiv for his mental grasp, but possibly the fault is with the reader. The analysis is conducted in a series of lectures entitled as follows: "The Essential Elements of the Universe," "The Systematic Arrangement of the Universe," "The Formation and the Dissolution of Worlds and of Systems," "The Origin, the Evolution, and the Destiny of Man." The author, in previous volumes, has demonstrated, so far as it is apparently possible to do so logically, that no such event as "creation" ever occurred, and as a consequence, that no such thing as a "creator," in the generally accepted definition of the word, ever existed. In this last volume he proceeds to demonstrate that of necessity the universe "is eternal in its existence and self-sustaining in its powers." The author shows with equal clearness that the universe is illimitable and indestructible, and it follows as a necessary corollary that space and duration are also both eternal and illimitable. The author indulges in several pages of ingenious metaphysical reasoning to prove that space and duration are one and the same, but we are constrained to confess he has not made this last proposition quite as clear as a pikestaff to our mental vision, although we are not disposed to wrangle over it. There is abundant food for thought in the first two chapters, which will interest, if not instruct, those who hav a taste for abstruse metaphysical ratiocinations. The field is certainly broad enough to satisfy the most ambitious. The general reader will no doubt be better pleased with the two following lectures, as the author returns to the realm of reality, or, at least probability. Here we hav the views of scientists presented in readable shape, interspersed now and then, to be sure, with ideas, suggestions, and speculations of the author. But he is never dreary, and the reader, though he may not agree with him, can scarcely fail to be impressed with their plausibility. Passing over that which may be considered speculativ, there is much information to be derived from a careful perusal of these two lectures and the one following. In the closing lecture, which consumes twenty-five pages, the author elucidates a theory of life-development, if in some respects peculiar, at least plausible and original in the method of presentation. He holds that all life is a unity, recognizing not only the "brotherhood of man," but also the brotherhood of all living organisms. And he illustrates this brotherhood of organisms as an Arbor Hominis. The tree of life rises from the primitiv ocean, its origin the cell. The trunk separates into five branches, and the center shoot, first in origin and consequently oldest in development, has already culminated in man, being itself divided into five branches, shown in the five races. Space will not permit full explanation of this picture, which so clearly illustrates the author's system. This lecture is the most interesting of the five. Our author arrives at the conclusion that time is divided into cycles, that is, that nature, after making the round of every possible combination, must necessarily repeat itself. Thus it is of human beings, each individual has had exact counterpart in every preceding series, and will hav in the series to follow, although the length of a cycle is inconceivable. As he expresses it: "Every preceding individual of this series has been exactly like me in his mind, his constitution, his character, his every lineament, his every act, his every thought." This attempt to giv to all nature a sort of individualized immortality is clever, but it is not new. Neither is there much consolation to be derived from an immortality which lacks the very requisit to make a future existence desirable—that of recollection. Dr. Ivan Slavanski, a Russian mathematician of some note, advanced a similar argument in a paper entitled, "Periodicity: A Mathematical and Physical Proof of the Immortality of Man." Here is a quotation:

> There will then come a time when all possible place-changes of the atoms hav been exhausted, and nature must return upon its tracks, as when a pendulum has swung to its utmost limit it must return again. When all changes become exhausted, the next position taken must be one which before existed.

Referring to the earth, he continues:

> The geological eras which hav made it what it is will again work out their necessary results, and man will appear again, each individual being precisely the individual he is now, for he will be born of the same parents, be reared under the same circumstances, liv as he now livs, with those with whom he livs, and die as he will die a few years from now.

There is but one weak point in this ingenious theory that occurs to us: If the atoms of the universe are illimitable, the number of possible combinations are illimitable also; hence, instead of the universe resolving itself into an infinity of recurring series or cycles, the universe is itself but an eternal procedure.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Gems of Thought.

A GOOD Christian should never go to law; rather should he giv up his coat and his pants, and everything that he hath. Churchmen never go to law; they are the most docil and easy creatures in the world on matters of business.—Voltaire.

"SUPPOSE," said the doctor, "instead of going into the South to subdue or kill our fellow-men, we had organized our vast army for the purpose of draining and reclaiming the Dismal Swamp. That would hav been a noble work. Where now that miserable tract is exhaling poisonous vapors, it might be to-day yielding fruits and grains to feed the children starving in our cities." "But," said Mr. Delano, "while our army were reclaiming the Dismal Swamp, the Southern army would hav been marching into our Northern towns and laying them waste!" "No, I think," said Miss Delano, "they would hav been astounded into very good humor, and would at once hav set about adjusting our quarrel amicably."—Marie Howland's Papa's Own Girl, Radical Novel.

A DOCTRIN more convenient for the purposes of tyrants and malefactors of every description than the non-resistance teaching of Christ it would be difficult to invent. At the same time it must be conceded that there is in it some truth, provided we discriminate between fitting and unfitting occasions for its application. It is not the violent man who assaults us, the unscrupulous man who sues us, or the persecutor who tramples on our freedom, who should be met by a benevolent return. But there are offenses of so personal a nature, affecting our individual interest so largely, and the public interest so slightly, that the best way of dealing with them may often be not to resent them, but to receive them with unruffled gentleness. Each person must judge for himself what are the cases to which this possibility applies. But the guiding rule in thus acting must be that we expect by thus returning good for evil to soften the heart of him who has done us wrong, and in the language of Paul to "heap coals of fire on his head." Should the effect be simply to relieve him from the penalty of our resentment without inducing him to change his course, we shall hav done him a moral injury and society a material injury, and the probability or improbability of such result should be measured in deciding upon the conduct to be pursued. Properly guarded, and borne in mind as the occasional exception, by no means as the rule, the return of injustice or ill-will by benevolence and kindly feeling may be of the utmost value, both in cultivating the best emotions in those who practice it, and in calling forth the repentance of those toward whom it is practiced; but as a universal and absolute principle it must be utterly rejected.—Amberley.

ON finding in another advanced society that the seats of highest culture are seats of disciplin in barbarism, where the test of manhood is the giving and taking of wounds in fights arising from trivial causes or none at all, and where, last year, a single day witnessed twenty-one such encounters in one university, we are reminded more of North American Indians, among whom tortures constitute the initiation of young men, than of civilized people taught for a thousand years to do good even to enemies. Or when we see, as lately in a nation akin to the last, that an officer who declined to break at once the law of his country and the law of his religion by fighting a duel, was expelled the army, we are obliged to admit that profession of a creed which forbids revenge, by those whose deeds emphatically assert revenge to be a duty (almost as emphatically as do the lowest races of men), presents humanity under an aspect not at all of the kind which we look for in "the adorable Great Being." Not reverence, not admiration, scarcely even respect, is caused by the sight of a hundred million pagans masquerading as Christians.—Spencer.

THE drying up of a single tear has more
Of honest fame than shedding seas of gore.
—Byron.

"I AM not come to bring peace but the sword," said the ingenuous founder of a creed which could not fail to produce an irrepressible conflict between the delusions of its doctrins and the inspirations of nature and science—and, of course, also between the would-be followers of its own preposterous precepts—and neither the lust of conquest nor the jealousy of rival nations has ever stained this earth with the torrents of blood shed by the bigots of that creed after its triumph over the protests of Freethought. The fatuous attempt to crush out dissent by substituting a roll of parchment for the book of Nature avenged itself by murderous wars about the interpretation of those same parchments. The dogmatists who had tried to perpetuate their power by the murder of modest rationalists, were assailed by hordes of their own irrationalists, raging about the ceremonial details of the wafer-rite and immersion rite. The bigots who had refused to heed the pleadings of Bruno and Campanella were forced to acknowledge the battle-ax logic of the Hussites.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald's Bible of Nature.

GETTING READY TO IMBIBE THE SPIRIT OF PROPHECY.

And the Lord came down in a cloud, and spake unto him, and took of the spirit that was upon him, and gave it unto the seventy elders: and it came to pass, that, when the spirit rested upon them, they prophesied.—Num. xi, 25.

Odds and Ends.

SPEECH is silvern, silence is golden, giggling is brazen, and laughter is often ironical.

THERE ought to be a law passed in Connecticut that railway restaurant keepers shall date their apple-pies.

WOMAN always was a siren. Even the five foolish virgins of scripture, whose lamps went out, did their best to beg 'ile!

"CAN a young man marry comfortably on $500 a year?" asks a correspondent. Yes, he can; but he will be deuced uncomfortable afterward.

MAGISTRATE (to small witness): "Teddy O'Toolihan, do you know where wicked people go to who tell lies?" Small witness: "Yis, sorr; they go to confission."

THE Sunday-school class was singing, "I want to be an angel." "Why don't you sing louder, Bobby?" asked the teacher. "I'm singing as loud as I want to be an angel," explained Bobby.

MISS PRIMSON (in drug store): "I want to get a good sponge bath." Clerk (aghast): "I—er—I beg pardon?" Miss Primson: "I say I want a nice bath sponge." Clerk: "Oh! Certainly."

"BRIDGET, has Johnnie come home from school yet?" "Yis, sorr." "Hav you seen him?" "No, sorr." "Then how do you know he's home?" "'Cause the cat's hidin' under the stove, sorr."

FATHER: "Well, Thomas, you hav graduated from college and are now ready for your life work. What will be your field?" Son (thoughtfully): "Well, to tell the truth, sir, it's a little hard to decide between left and center."

DEACON: "I was terribly shocked, my dear, to discover on my way home from church a match game of baseball being played on the vacant lot near the park." Wife: "Was it that which made you so very late, deacon?"

"ALL the men are not fools, anyhow," snapped Mrs. Curtly to her husband during a little domestic discussion. "No, my dear," replied Mr. C., with true manly politeness. "No, there are a few bachelors left as samples."

"GRACIOUS me!" said old Mrs. Bently, who was reading an account of a public dinner. "What's the matter?" inquired old Mr. Bently. "What an awful amount o' toast these men do eat! I should think it would make 'em thirsty."

LITTLE Chicago boy: "Kin ye help a poor, harmless, helpless boy?" Kind citizen: "I reckon so. Are you an orphan, sonny?" Boy: "I'm wuss nor an orphan. Me fadder an' mudder is both diworced an' married agin', an' I don't know whose boy I am, an' am slowly fergittin' me own name."

AFTER THE MORNING SERMON.—Johnny: "Ouch! Yah-r-r-r-oh! Yiep-p-p!—d-d-don' take th' b-b-ack of th' b-brush! G-g g-rh! I won' d-do it again—ow-wow-wow!!" Grandma: "John William, your father's mother is nigh on to eighty years old, but she worked a well-sweep all her festiv youth, and the next time you feel like giving her a grasshopper in place of a clove during the solemn service of the Methodist Episcopal church, you don't want to do it!" (Clip—swipe—swat!)

"MY friend," said a tariff maniac, "do you believe in free whisky or free wool?" "Free whisky, of course; we must hav clothes." "How's that?" "With whisky cheaper we can drink the same amount and still hav a surplus for clothing."

WORK TOO ARDUOUS.—French maid: "It's mesilf, mum, what wud giv yez a wake's notice." Mistress: "Why, Marie, you get good wages and you hav only to assist me with my toilet." French maid: "Yis, but it's the lacing, mum, that's beyant me strinth."

YOUNG CHATEAUX: "I really don't care to become a lawyer. I should run very little chance of becoming eminent at the bar." Old Chateaux (acute observer): "Never fear. If you fail to achieve eminence you might become chief justice of the United States."

"YOU seem in great haste, young man," he said, solemnly. "Do you know that Sunday should be observed as a day of rest?" "Yes, sir," responded the young man, "and that's the reason I'm in such a hurry. I want to get a seat on the grand stand before they're all sold."

MUST BE RESCUED GRAMMATICALLY.—He was rescuing her from the billowy waves, but it looked as if they might never see Boston again. "Hold on tight, Penelope," he gasped, "hold on tight." "Don't say hold on tight," gurgled the girl, with her mouth full of Atlantic ocean; "say hold on tightly."

YOUTH: "I've got some poetry here I'd like to hav you look over." Editor: "Yes, sir. Hav you got your license with you?" Youth: "My license?" Editor: "Yes; your poetic license." Youth: "N-n-no. I didn't know I had to hav one." Editor: "We never look over any poetry without first seeing the poet's license. Good day."

"O MY love! my angel! To think that you will be my own little wife! May I speak to your father to-day?" "Better wait till to-morrow, dearest George. Papa would not feel that he could part with me were you to ask him to-day, but my milliner's bill is due to-morrow, and papa will jump at the chance to see me safely disposed of."

THE small son of a Baptist clergyman recently had his first pair of boots. They were somewhat hard to get on, and he tugged and stamped and twisted for some time before they were where they should be. "My goodness! mamma. Didn't they go on hard?" he said. "I came near saying devil, but then I remembered papa has told us we must not take the name of the Lord our God in vain."

A TIPSY Indian, having strayed from his wigwam, found himself lost on trying to return to it. After looking about in strange lodges here and there, the Indian exclaimed, in dismay, "Injun lost!" but recovering himself, and unwilling to acknowledge such short-sightedness, continued, drawing himself up, "No, Injun not lost—wigwam lost [striking his breast]; Injun here."

DEAN BURGON, of Chichester, was recently speaking on the nature of man as distinguished from the lower orders of creation. "Man," he remarked, "is a progressiv being; the others are stationary. Think, for example, of the ass. Always and everywhere it is the same creature; and you never saw, and never will see, a more perfect ass than you see at the present moment."

Notes and Clippings.

HERBERT SPENCER is working on his autobiography, but his poor health prevents his making much progress.

AN eminent Boston electrician and a New York doctor are declared to hav fears that legal execution by electricity may not result in the certain death of the criminal. For this reason they advocate the immediate cremation of the electrokteined body, so that, in case he has not been shocked to death, the prisoner may at all events be reduced to ashes and rendered incapable of further mischief.

THE persecution of Protestants in the Baltic provinces of Russia continues. Several Lutheran pastors having lately been acquitted by the lower court of having insulted the Orthodox church, it is now announced that a new law will be promulgated, according to which henceforth any Lutheran pastor accused of having attacked the dogmas of the Russian church must answer before a tribunal composed solely of members of the Greek church.

THE Rev. Dr. Henson, of Chicago, preached in St. Paul Sunday before last, on newspapers, taking as his text the speech of the editor of the New York Sun before the Wisconsin journalists. Dr. Henson said: "Dana says that it is the business of a newspaper to publish news. I deny it. There is a great deal that happens that has no business in print anywhere. It is not decent. It may be news, but it is news that ought never to see the light of day." Quoting this, the Sun comments: "This is right. We hav always observed Dr. Henson's rule. Reports of immoral acts alleged against clergymen hav never been admitted into our columns except they were brought before the courts." The preachers will in time learn to let the newspapers alone.

FRANCE is surprised at the operation of its new divorce law. The first year such a thing as a divorce was recognized by the law there were 1,800 granted, the second year 4,000, and the third year 4,500. Sixty women demand divorce for every forty men, and in more than half the cases that come before the courts there are no children. There are four divorces for every thousand marriages in France now, and in Paris the rate is forty-seven for every thousand marriages.

"A STRANGE condition of double belief," says the Independent, "has been developed under the pressure of a law forbidding the orthodox subjects of the czar to ever change their faith. A man, orthodox for his majesty's and the holy synod's sake and Protestant in his conscience, such a man could be raised only in Russia, under the despotic lay and clerical régime. And as the double belief at length leads to no belief, it can be safely stated that of all the governments of our time only that of holy Russia is systematically fostering Infidelity."

THE Jesuit father, F. T. McCarthy, in a late lecture on "Education," delivered at the Church of our Lady of Perpetual Help in Boston, said: "When the state steps in and assumes the role of school-teacher, then there is the invasion of the individual right, the invasion of the domestic rights, the invasion of the rights of the church, and the invasion of divine rights. There is no circumstance under which the state is allowed to teach. It [the public school] is subversiv of the rights of the individual, subversiv of the rights of the family, subversiv of the rights of religion, subversiv of the divine rights of God himself. It [the public school system of America] is a national fraud."

WILLIAM ROBERTS, a farmer of Princeton, Wis., his wife and four children, complain that their house has been bewitched for months by an old German woman named Albright living across the road. Lately Roberts took his gun and started to kill her, and had to be placed in custody to protect her. On the 21st ult. the case came before Justice McConnell, who had, the papers report, a book on occult sciences at his elbow, and had been preparing himself by consulting the authorities on witchcraft. On the witness stand the family told how they had summoned the parish priest and asked him to dissolve the charm, and he had confessed to them that it seemed as if supernatural agencies were at work, and he would hav to consult the bishop in order to obtain the interposition of the church in the afflicted family's behalf. The case has been continued three weeks.

THE law of this state in regard to marriage, as expounded by the court of appeals, is to the following effect: "By the law of this state, a man and a woman who are competent to marry each other, without going before a minister or magistrate, with no previous public notice given, with no form or ceremony, civil or religious, and with no record or written evidence of the act kept, and merely by words of present contract between them, may take upon themselvs the relations of husband and wife, and be bound to themselvs, to the state, and to society as such; and if, after that, the marriage is denied, proof of actual cohabitation as husband and wife, acknowledgment and recognition of each other to friends and acquaintances and the public as such and the general reputation therefor, will enable the court to presume that there was in the beginning an actual and bona-fide marriage. The religious press are abusing this decision, as they want marriage to be a "sacrament."

SUDDENLY one morning, a few weeks ago, we were confronted in our morning papers by the announcement that at the meeting of the school board Swinton's text-book, "Outlines of the World's History," was voted to be withdrawn from the public schools because, according to the Roman Catholics, it perverted history. This announcement was a bombshell to the many who had listened and thought with only that vague interest that is provoked by imperfect knowledge of a subject. The keen and watchful observers who had been for years uttering their protests on various occasions, were the only ones who were not surprised. This very kind of crisis was what they had predicted. The tolerant descendants of the Puritans who had worn their governmental suit of clothes so loosely and been so proud of the wearing, were aghast. They had trusted an unknown quantity. They had given to others what they claimed for themselvs, the largest liberty to manage their own affairs, and had discovered that they themselvs were being managed and betrayed by the people whom they had thus trusted, by that unknown quantity of Jesuitism which had been quietly biding its time.—Independent.

Selected.

The Divided Household of Faith.

From the North American Review.

Let determined things to destiny hold unbewailed their way.

There is a continual effort in the mind of man to find the harmony that he knows must exist between all known facts. It is hard for the scientist to implicitly believe anything that he suspects to be inconsistent with a known fact. He feels that every fact s a key to many mysteries—that every fact is a deectiv, not only, but a perpetual witness. He knows that a fact has a countless number of sides, and that all these sides will match all other facts, and he also suspects that to understand one fact perfectly—like the fact of the attraction of gravitation—would involve a knowledge of the universe.

It requires not only candor, but courage, to accept a fact. When a new fact is found it is generally denied, resisted, and calumniated by the conservativs until denial becomes absurd, and then they accept it with the statement that they always supposed it was true.

. . . . . .

Most religions—no matter how honestly they originated—hav been established by brute force. Kings and nobles hav used them as a means to enslave, to degrade and rob. The priest, consciously and unconsciously, has been the betrayer of his followers.

Near Chicago there is an ox that betrays his fellows. Cattle—twenty or thirty at a time—are driven to the place of slaughter. This ox leads the way—the others follow. When the place is reached, this Bishop Dupanloup turns and goes back for other victims.

This is the worst side: There is a better.

Honest men, believing that they hav found the whole truth—the real and only faith—filled with enthusiasm, giv all for the purpose of propagating the "divine creed." They found colleges and universities, and in perfect, pious, ignorant sincerity provide that the creed, and nothing but the creed, must be taught, and that if any professor teaches anything contrary to that, he must be instantly dismissed—that is to say, the children must be beaten with the bones of the dead.

These good religious souls erect guideboards with a provision to the effect that the guideboards must remain, whether the roads are changed or not, and with the further provision that the professors who keep and repair the guideboards must always insist that the roads hav not been changed.

There is still another side.

Professors do not wish to lose their salaries. They love their families and hav some regard for themselvs. There is a compromise between their bread and their brain. On pay-day they believe—at other times they hav their doubts. They settle with their own consciences by giving old words new meanings. They take refuge in allegory, hide behind parables, and barricade themselvs with oriental imagery. They giv to the most frightful passages a spiritual meaning—and while they teach the old creed to their followers, they speak a new philosophy to their equals.

There is still another side.

A vast number of clergymen and laymen are perfectly satisfied. They hav no doubts. They believe as their fathers and mothers did. The "scheme of salvation" suits them because they are satisfied that they are embraced within its terms. They giv themselvs no trouble. They believe because they do not understand. They hav no doubts because they do not think. They regard doubt as a thorn in the pillow of orthodox slumber. Their souls are asleep, and they hate only those who disturb their dreams. These people keep their creeds for future use. They intend to hav them ready at the moment of dissolution. They sustain about the same relation to daily life that the small boats carried by steamers do to ordinary navigation—they are for the moment of shipwreck. Creeds, like life-preservers, are to be used in disaster.

A few centuries ago the art of printing was invented. A new world was discovered. There was a complete revolution in commerce. The arts were born again. The world was filled with adventure; millions became self-reliant; old ideas were abandoned—old theories were put aside—and suddenly, the old leaders of thought were found to be ignorant, shallow, and dishonest. The literature of the classic world was discovered and translated into modern languages. The world was circumnavigated; Copernicus discovered the true relation sustained by our earth to the solar system, and about the beginning of the seventeenth century many other wonderful discoveries were made. In 1609, a Hollander found that two lenses placed in a certain relation to each other magnified objects seen through them. This discovery was the foundation of astronomy. In a little while it came to the knowledge of Galileo; the result was a telescope, with which man has read the volume of the skies.

On the 8th day of May, 1618, Kepler discovered the greatest of his three laws. These were the first great blows struck for the enfranchisment of the human mind. A few began to suspect that the ancient Hebrews were not astronomers. From that moment the church became the enemy of science. In every possible way the inspired ignorance was defended—the lash, the sword, the chain, the fagot, and the dungeon were the arguments used by the infuriated church.

To such an extent was the church prejudiced against the new philosophy, against the new facts, that priests refused to look through the telescope of Galileo.

At last it became evident to the intelligent world that the inspired writings, literally translated, did not contain the truth—the Bible was in danger of being driven from the heavens.

The church also had its geology. The time when the earth was created had been definitly fixed and was certainly known. This fact had not only been stated by inspired writers, but their statement had been indorsed by priests, by bishops, cardinals, popes, and ecumenical councils; that was settled.

But a few men had learned the art of seeing. There were some eyes not always closed in prayer. They looked at the things about them; they observed channels that had been worn in solid rock by streams; they saw the vast territories that had been deposited by rivers; their attention was called to the slow inroads upon continents by seas—to the deposits by volcanoes—to the sedimentary rocks—to the vast reefs that had been built by the coral, and to the countless evidences of age, of the lapse of time—and finally it was demonstrated that this earth has been pursuing its course about the sun for millions and millions of ages.

The church disputed every step, denied every fact, resorted to every device that cunning could suggest or ingenuity execute, but the conflict could not be maintained. The Bible, so far as geology was concerned, was in danger of being driven from the earth.

Beaten in the open field, the church began to equivocate, to evade, and to giv new meanings to inspired words. Finally, falsehood having failed to harmonize the guesses of barbarians with the discoveries of genius, the leading churchmen suggested that the Bible was not written to teach astronomy, was not written to teach geology, and that it was not a scientific book, but that it was written in the language of the people, and that as to unimportant things it contained the general beliefs of its time.

The ground was then taken that, while it was not inspired in its science, it was inspired in its morality, in its prophecy, in its account of the miraculous, in the scheme of salvation, and in all that it had to say on the subject of religion.

The moment it was suggested that the Bible was not inspired in everything within its lids the seeds of suspicion were sown. The priest became less arrogant. The church was forced to explain. The pulpit had one language for the faithful and another for the the philosophical, i.e., it became dishonest with both.

The next question that arose was as to the origin of man.

The Bible was being driven from the skies. The testimony of the stars was against the sacred volume. The church had also been forced to admit that the world was not created at the time mentioned in the Bible—so that the very stones of the earth rose and united with the stars in giving testimony against the sacred volume.

As to the creation of the world, the church resorted to the artifice of saying that "days" in reality meant long periods of time; so that no matter how old the earth was, the time could be spanned by six periods—in other words, that the years could not be too numerous to be divided by six.

But when it came to the creation of man, this evasion, or artifice, was impossible. The Bible givs the date of the creation of man, because it givs the age at which the first man died, and then it givs the generations from Adam to the flood, and from the flood to the birth of Christ, and in many instances the actual age of the principal ancestor is given. So that, according to this account—according to the inspired figures—man has existed upon the earth only about six thousand years. There is no room left for any people beyond Adam.

If the Bible is true, certainly Adam was the first man; consequently we know, if the sacred volume be true, just how long man has lived and labored and suffered on this earth.

The church cannot and dare not giv up the account of the creation of Adam from the dust of the earth, and of Eve from the rib of the man. The church cannot giv up the story of the garden of Eden—the serpent, the fall, and the expulsion. These must be defended because they are vital. Without these absurdities, the system known as Christianity cannot exist. Without the fall, the atonement is a non sequitur. Facts bearing upon these questions were discovered and discussed by the greatest and most truthful of men. Lamarck, Humboldt, Haeckel, and above all, Darwin, not only asserted, but demonstrated, that man is not a special creation. If anything can be established by observation, by reason, then the fact has been established that man is related to all life below him; that he has been slowly produced through countless years; that the story of Eden is a childish myth; that the fall of man is an infinit absurdity.

. . . . . .

The church, however, has not been willing to accept these truths, because they contradict the sacred word. Some of the most ingenious of the clergy hav been endeavoring for years to show that there is no conflict—that the account in Genesis is in perfect harmony with the theories of Charles Darwin—and these clergymen in some way manage to retain their creed, and to accept a philosophy that utterly destroys it.

It is, however, still insisted that the Bible is inspired in its morality. Let us examin this question.

We must admit, if we know anything, if we feel anything, if conscience is more than a word, if there is such a thing as right and such a thing as wrong beneath the dome of heaven, we must admit that slavery is immoral. If we are honest, we must also admit that the Old Testament upholds slavery. It will be cheerfully admitted that Jehovah was opposed to the enslavement of one Hebrew by another. Christians may quote the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal," as being opposed to human slavery, but after that commandment was given Jehovah himself told his chosen people that they might "buy their bondmen and bondwomen of the heathen round about, and that they should be their bondmen and their bondwomen forever." So all that Jehovah meant by the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal," was that one Hebrew should not steal from another Hebrew, but that all Hebrews might steal from the people of any other race or creed.

It is perfectly apparent that the Ten Commandments were made only for the Jews, not for the world, because the author of these commandments commanded the people to whom they were given to violate them nearly all as against the surrounding people.

A few years ago it did not occur to the Christian world that slavery was wrong. It was upheld by the church. Ministers bought and sold the very people for whom they declared that Christ had died. Clergymen of the English church owned stock in slave ships, and the man who denounced slavery was regarded as the enemy of morality, and thereupon was duly mobbed by the followers of Jesus Christ. Churches were built with the results of labor stolen from colored Christians. Babes were sold from mothers, and a part of the money given to send missionaries from America to heathen lands with the tidings of great joy. Now every intelligent man on the earth, every decent man, holds in abhorrence the institution of human slavery.

So with the institution of polygamy. If anything on the earth is immoral, that is. If there is anything calculated to destroy home, to do away with human love, to blot out the idea of family life, to cover the hearthstone with serpents, it is the institution of polygamy. The Jehovah of the Old Testament was a believer in that institution.

Can we now say that the Bible is inspired in its morality? Consider for a moment the manner in which, under the direction of Jehovah, wars were waged. Remember the atrocities that were committed. Think of a war where everything was the food of the sword. Think for a moment of a deity capable of committing the crimes that are described and gloated over in the Old Testament. The civilized man has outgrown the sacred cruelties and absurdities.

There is still another side to this question.

A few centuries ago nothing was more natural than the unnatural. Miracles were as plentiful as actual events. In those blessed days, that which actually occurred was not regarded of sufficient importance to be recorded. A religion without miracles would hav excited derision. A creed that did not fill the horizon, that did not account for everything, that could not answer every question, would hav been regarded as worthless.

After the birth of Protestantism, it could not be admitted by the leaders of the Reformation that the Catholic church still had the power of working miracles. If the Catholic church was still in partnership with God, what excuse could hav been made for the Reformation? The Protestants took the ground that the age of miracles had passed. This was to justify the new faith. But Protestants could not say that miracles had never been performed, because that would take the foundation not only from the Catholics but from themselvs; consequently, they were compelled to admit that miracles were performed in the apostolic days, but to insist that in their time man must rely upon the facts in nature. Protestants were compelled to carry on two kinds of war; they had to contend with those who insisted that miracles had never been performed; and in that argument they were forced to insist upon the necessity for miracles, on the probability that they were performed, and upon the truthfulness of the apostles.

A moment afterward, they had to answer those who contended that miracles were performed at that time; then they brought forward against the Catholics the same arguments that their first opponents had brought against them.

This has made every Protestant brain "a house divided against itself." This planted in the Reformation the "irrepressible conflict."

We hav at last ascertained that miracles can be perfectly understood; that there is nothing mysterious about them; that they are simply transparent falsehoods.

. . . . . .

Let us see what the church, within a few years, has been compelled substantially to abandon—that is to say, what it is now almost ashamed to defend.

First, the astronomy of the sacred scriptures; second, the geology; third, the account given of the origin of man; fourth, the doctrin of original sin, the fall of the human race; fifth, the mathematical contradiction known as the trinity; sixth, the atonement—because it was only on the ground that man is accountable for the sin of another, that he could be justified by reason of the righteousness of another; seventh, that the miraculous is either the misunderstood or the impossible; eighth, that the Bible is not inspired in its morality, for the reason that slavery is not moral, that polygamy is not good, that wars of extermination are not merciful, and that nothing can be more immoral than to punish the innocent on account of the sins of the guilty; and, ninth, the divinity of Christ.

All this must be given up by the really intelligent, by those not afraid to think, by those who hav the courage of their convictions and the candor to express their thoughts.

. . . . . .

Once the pulpit was the leader—it spoke with authority. By its side was the sword of the state, with the hilt toward its hand. Now it is apologized for—it carries a weight. It is now like a living man to whom has been chained a corpse. It cannot defend the old, and it has not accepted the new. In some strange way it imagins that morality cannot liv except in partnership with the sanctified follies and falsehoods of the past.

The old creeds cannot be defended by argument. They are not within the circumference of reason—they are not embraced in any of the facts within the experience of man. All the subterfuges hav been exposed; all the excuses hav been shown to be shallow, and at last the church must meet, and fairly meet, the objections of our time.

Solemnity is no longer an argument. Falsehood is no longer sacred. People are not willing to admit that mistakes are divine. Truth is more important than belief—far better than creeds, vastly more useful than superstitions. The church must accept the truths of the present, must admit the demonstrations of science, or take its place in the mental museums with the fossils and monstrosities of the past.

As a last resource, the orthodox tell the thoughtful that they are not "spiritual"—that they are "of the earth, earthy"—that they cannot perceive that which is spiritual. They insist that "God is a spirit, and must be worshiped in spirit."

But let me ask, What is it to be spiritual? In order to be really spiritual, must a man sacrifice this world for the sake of another? Were the selfish hermits, who deserted their wives and children for the miserable purpose of saving their own little souls, spiritual? Were those who put their fellowmen in dungeons, or burned them at the stake on account of a difference of opinion, all spiritual people? Did John Calvin giv evidence of his spirituality by burning Servetus? Were they spiritual people who invented and used instruments of torture—who denied the liberty of thought and expression—who waged wars for the propagation of the faith? Were they spiritual people who insisted that infinit love could punish his poor, ignorant children forever? Is it necessary to believe in eternal torment to understand the meaning of the word spiritual? Is it necessary to hate those who disagree with you, and to calumniate those whose argument you cannot answer, in order to be spiritual? Must you hold a demonstrated fact in contempt; must you deny or avoid what you know to be true, in order to substantiate the fact that you are spiritual?

What is it to be spiritual? Is the man spiritual who searches for the truth—who livs in accordance with his highest ideal—who loves his wife and children—who discharges his obligations—who makes a happy fireside for the ones he loves—who succors the oppressed—who givs his honest opinions—who is guided by principle—who is merciful and just?

Is the man spiritual who loves the beautiful—who is thrilled by music, and touched to tears in the presence of the sublime, the heroic, and the self-denying? Is the man spiritual who endeavors by thought and deed to ennoble the human race?

The defenders of the orthodox faith, by this time, should know that the foundations are insecure.

They should hav the courage to defend, or the candor to abandon. If the Bible is an inspired book, it ought to be true. Its defenders must admit that Jehovah knew the facts not only about the earth, but about the stars, and that the creator of the universe knew all about geology and astronomy even four thousand years ago.

The champions of Christianity must show that the Bible tells the truth about the creation of man, the garden of Eden, the temptation, the fall, and the flood. They must take the ground that the sacred book is historically correct; that the events related really happened; that the miracles were actually performed; that the laws promulgated from Sinai were and are wise and just; and that nothing is upheld, commanded, or indorsed, or in any way approved or sustained, that is not absolutely right. In other words, if they insist that a being of infinit goodness and intelligence is the author of the Bible, they must be ready to show that it is absolutely perfect. They must defend its astronomy, geology, history, miracle, and morality.

If the Bible is true, man is a special creation, and if man is a special creation, millions of facts must hav conspired, millions of ages ago, to deceive the scientific world of to-day.

If the Bible is true, slavery is right, and the world should go back to the barbarism of the lash and chain. If the Bible is true, polygamy is the highest form of virtue. If the Bible is true, nature has a master, and the miraculous is independent of and superior to cause and effect. If the Bible is true, most of the children of men are destined to suffer eternal pain. If the Bible is true, the science known as astronomy is a collection of mistakes, the telescope is a false witness, and light is a luminous liar. If the Bible is true, the science known as geology is false and every fossil is a petrified perjurer.

The defenders of orthodox creeds should hav the courage to candidly answer at least two questions: First, Is the Bible inspired? Second, Is the Bible true? And when they answer these questions, they should remember that if the Bible is true, it needs no inspiration, and that if not true, inspiration can do it no good.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Wesley and the Revolution.

An oppressed people hav asked nothing more than their rights.

The above words appear in a letter, concerning the American colonists, which Wesley is said to hav written to the earl of Dartmouth. This letter is being circulated by Wesley's admirers to convince a credulous public that during the Revolution he was the ardent friend of America. But nothing can be more remote from the truth than this claim. Wesley was not the friend but the enemy of America. If he did write this letter, if at first he sympathized with the Americans, like Benedict Arnold, he soon found it convenient to desert their cause, and uphold the despotic rule of the king. The letter to Dartmouth is dated June 14, 1775. A few months later, in "A Calm Address to Our American Colonies," we find Wesley giving expression to such "calm" sentiments as the following:

Brethren and countrymen, The grand question which is now debated (and with warmth enough on both sides) is this, Has the English Parliament power to tax the American colonies? . . . The supreme power in England has a legal right of laying any tax upon them for any end beneficial to the whole empire (Wesley's Miscellaneous Works, vol. iii, p. 130).

They hav a right to all which the king has given them, but not to all which they hav given themselvs (Ibid, p. 132).

You hav, therefore, exactly what your ancestors left you, not a vote in making laws, nor in choosing legislators, but the happiness of being protected by laws, and the duty of obeying them (Ibid).

In answer to the claim that the colonists "are entitled to life, liberty, and property by nature," he affirms that the king and Parliament hav "the power of disposing, without their consent, of both their lives, liberties, and properties" (Ibid). [The italics are Wesley's.]

After all the vehement cry for liberty, what more liberty can you hav? (Ibid, p. 134).

Should any man talk or write of the Dutch government as every cobbler does of the English, he would be laid in irons (Ibid).

Be warned in time. Stand and consider before it is too late. . . . Let us put away our sins, the real ground of all our calamities! Which never will or can be thoroughly removed, till we fear God and honor the king (Ibid, p. 135).

A short time after the publication of his "Calm Address," in reply to a sermon preached by Dr. Smith, of Philadelphia, in defense of the colonies, he petulantly inquires:

What liberty do you want, either civil or religious? You had the very same liberty we hav in England. I say you had, but you hav thrown away the substance, and retain only the shadow (Ibid).

Your rights are no more violated than mine (Ibid, p. 136).

But "a people will resume," you say, "the power which they never surrendered, except——" No need of any exception. They never surrendered it at all; they could not surrender it, for they never had it (Ibid).

In conclusion he says:

You "profess yourselvs to be contending for liberty," but it is a vain, empty profession, unless you mean by that threadbare word, a liberty from obeying your rightful sovereign, and from keeping the fundamental laws of your country. And this undoubtedly it is, which the confederated colonies are now contending for (Ibid).

He characterizes the Americans as "rebels." June 28, 1777, just two years and two weeks after the date of the Dartmouth letter, in a controversial tract, he writes as follows:

Do all these [dissenters] defend the American rebels? Who affirms it? I hope not a quarter, not a tenth part of them (Ibid, p. 486).

In the same tract, again referring to the Americans, he says:

As soon as I was convinced they sought independence, I knew they were in the wrong (Ibid, p. 487).

In a letter to Joseph Benson, written in 1777, Wesley records a scrap of history that ought to be kept before the public so long as boastful Methodism, with its arrogant and meddling priests, survives to curse our country. He writes:

I hav just received two letters from New York. . . . They inform me that all the Methodists there were firm for the government, and on that account persecuted by the rebels (Ibid, pp. 410, 411).

Thus in the darkest hours of the Revolution, when our patriotic fathers were suffering privations and miseries unspeakable, when the cherished hopes of freedom seemed fading forever from their sight, when heroic champions of liberty from other lands—the Lafayettes, the Steubens, and the Pulaskis—were giving their treasures and shedding their blood to sustain if possible the just cause, this Methodist pope was gloating with satisfaction over the assurance that the American dupes were all Tories!

Writing to a friend during the Revolution, he says:

I made an offer to the government of raising some men. The secretary of war (by the king's order) wrote me word "that it was not necessary, but if ever it should be necessary his majesty would let me know" (Ibid, p. 414).

In 1782, in an article entitled, "How Far is it the Duty of a Christian Minister to Preach Politics?" he bitterly denounces those who hav seen fit to censure the king and his ministry for the manner in which they hav prosecuted the war against the Americans. He concludes that generally ministers should refrain from preaching politics; "but when they are censured without any color of reason, and when an odium is cast on the king by that means, we ought to preach politics in this sense also; we ought publicly to confute those unjust censures" (Ibid, p. 137).

When the war had ended, alluding to George III., he affirms that "his whole conduct . . . has been worthy of an Englishman, worthy of a Christian, and worthy of a king" (Ibid, p. 104).

During the Revolutionary struggle George III. did not hav a more fawning sycophant, nor the American patriots a more ungenerous foe, than John Wesley, and every attempt to conceal or palliate the fact will only serve to giv it wider publicity.

J. E. REMSBURG.

An Erring Enthusiast.

Christian history is the history of civilization; Christianity alone is the civilizer of the human animal. At best, the race beyond its pale exhibits only here and there a specimen of true manhood. It is only as enlightened from the manger of Bethlehem and the cross of Calvary that the race ceases to be savage.

Thus carelessly, but dogmatically, writes Bishop Coxe, of New York; and the Chicago daily News, commenting on the sentiment, pronounces it "monstrous."

And so it is; and absolutely destitute of truth. One who can thus deliberately falsify history must indeed hav his mental faculties obscured by prejudice.

Those elements that now make up our civilization are, with scarcely a notable exception, gifts to us from the pagan ante-Christian, ante-Christ ages of the world. It was thought proper to say of Moses that "he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians;" and from Egypt after centuries were handed down to the thrifty and enlightened republics of commercial Phœnicia, the splendidly civilized democracies of Greece, and to immortal Rome, those arts and sciences which, received by Egypt from earlier and not less enlightened governments, enabled that wonderful country, though scarcely more extensiv than our territory of Dakota, to support in peace, plenty, and happiness a population equal to that of the United States in 1887, and to embellish and enrich, at the time of Amasias, twenty thousand cities.

What is civilization? A state of organized society whose members hav the manners of those who liv in cities—manners opposed to those of rustics and barbarians. But, in a more comprehensiv sense, and as we understand it, civilization means the cultivation of the arts and sciences, their adaptation to the needs of man, and the rendering by man of all his duties to his fellow-men, and also the concession to him of all his rights. If civilization means more than this, our lexicographers are grossly at fault. From pagan Greece we hav received architecture, poetry, philosophy, sculpture, tragedy, comedy, geometry, physics, history, and politics; and, in the language of a famous historian, "its monuments of art still form the basis of taste for all civilized nations." The age of Pericles was five hundred years before the "carpenter's son" walked the stormy waters of Chineroth. Is the civilization of Rome of to-day, of Greece of to-day, of Palestine of to-day (for Mohammedanism is a phase of Christianity), a type of the civilization of Christianity? Christianity found the world enjoying the highest state of civilization; but after a few centuries of Christian enterprise there came upon mankind the dense moral darkness of the medieval ages. Our civilization is not the product of Christianity. The reverse is entirely true. Modern Christianity is one of the peculiar products of the present civilization of Europe and America.

Dr. Lespinasse, a cultured, practical Freethinker, enlists as a life-member. He was born and reared in the atmosphere of reason and imbibed incredulity with his mother's milk. For many years his father was one of the shining apostles of Freethought in Holland, and continued the good fight to the end after coming to this country, being the only person buried in Sioux county whose funeral was not afflicted by the presence of "sky-pilots," as he termed them. The doctor was doubtless preordained as a "lost sheep," for he never read three lines of the holy book until after he was eighteen years of age, his father saying that it was a waste of time, which a subsequent perusal confirmed as the proper diagnosis. Our friend thus states the case ex tacito: "I was struck by your arguments in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Certainly no church could exist without free contributions pouring in from the faithful, and no organization can possibly be a success without the wherewith to pay expenses. Lack of enthusiasm among Liberals is astonishingly great. I hav often wondered why. Every Liberal could afford $100 or $50 a year to advance the cause, and while wondering I was constantly guilty myself. I hope this will procure absolution from the heinous sin of indifference."

Mrs. Lake's letters, besides breathing hope and bringing substantial aid, are a flat contradiction to the oft-repeated assertion that woman cannot reason. She is asking the preachers how, if God made man in the "beginning," he will hav an endless life. "Can anything be endless that has a beginning?" Her heroic resolution to fight superstition is here given:

Shall I be carried to the skies on flowery beds of ease,
While others fight and falter not and always pay the fees?
By all above, around, below,
This is my earnest answer, "No!"

Is there no answer from a hundred others?

Brother Willis, also a life-member, fights superstition and bigotry with a boldness and bravery that challenge our admiration. He also labors for the elevation of mankind by destroying monopolies and improving social conditions with a devotion and persistence which prove that he possesses heart as well as brain. He believes that "religion is humanity's curse, and sustained by ignorance it will liv until intelligence becomes general. So our work is educational—a slow process." He also will be at Pittsburgh.

A Secular Union is planted at McMinnville, Ore., by President Putnam, on whose oriflam is inscribed, "Organize, organize." The noble band at that point, among whom are Mr. and Mrs. Olds and Mr. J. E. Brooks, will not let the watchfires die out at McMinnville for want of attendance.

James Gruber is a true soldier of the Secular cause, a hard-working, enthusiastic member of the Chicago society, and a whole-souled fellow in general. "Jim" is one of our deacons. His charming wife is also the accomplished alto of the Secular Union quartet, and volunteers her services.

John Courbet is one of the numerous TRUTH SEEKER family of St. Paul who believes something should be done in his own city. Brother Marlett's business—American express messenger—takes him to that point every week, so I sent leaflets and literature in abundance. Brother Marlett found Mr. Courbet stocked with a vast amount of solid information and discovered that he was quite a reader and thinker. St. Paul will, we hope, be brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in the American Secular Union this fall, through Brother Courbet and others with whom we are negotiating.

A. J. Kraft, the postmaster at Grantfork, Ill., is doing his share to disperse the dark clouds of superstition and priestcraft, as he is scattering Liberal literature thickly in his neighborhood. He also forwards $2 more, saying that he feels that duty calls and he must obey. There are a good many thousand Liberals who are dead to the call of duty. We tender our thanks again to A. J. Kraft.

Our Perrysville, Pa., friends, Mrs. James and Andrew Beveridge, are among the sturdy friends of Freethought and humanity, and evidence their solicitude for the Secular cause in a practical way. They express regret that they had not sent sooner, but say "it is better late than never." Well, I should remark it is. We do not wish to prohibit that kind of a beverage, whether late or not.

"Old Mr. Johnson" has been out in Washington territory since May, and has just returned to Chicago. Age has not dimmed his enthusiasm for Freethought, and he feels as interested in the cause as when he helped George Jacob Holyoake to stem the tide of bigotry in England many years ago.

Mrs. Martin sends her contribution with regrets about "What Can a Woman Do?" Her efforts very ably answer that question. If similar responses were sufficiently numerous, it would be seen that women are the very life and energy of all great movements. Without them we cannot hope for success.

Mayor Roche having received some unfavorable criticism at my hands, I readily hasten to record his commendable appointment to the board of education of a leading Scandinavian citizen, a stanch Freethinker, a subscriber and eager reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a member of the Chicago Secular Union, Chas. J. Sundell. Born in Stockholm, Mr. Sundell came to this city in 1857, and the next year received the appointment of Swedish and Norwegian vice-consul at Chicago, a post he held until 1861. In that year he was appointed by President Lincoln United States consul at Stettin, Prussia, in which position he served till 1867, when he returned to Chicago, and has ever since been the agent of the Allan Royal Mail Steamship Company. Mr. Sundell is considered the intellectual head of his countrymen, being invariably called upon to address any of their gatherings if it is of a progressiv character. His selection reflects honor on the cause as well as on the character and ability of the man. So far as possible the secretary will hav an able ally in Mr. Sundell. Especially will he endeavor to make the schools the secular institutions they should be, nor will he be any cipher on the board when he becomes familiar with the work.

When Brother Jamieson and Miss Helen H. Gardener lectured in Quitman, Mo., it was learned that the principal of the school, Geo. H. Dawes, was a Liberal, and he was consequently made the text of several sermons, and industriously lied about in the pulpit for "Christ's sake" until his dismissal was accomplished. Brother Dawes then moved his family to Pittsville, Wis., hoping to procure the principalship of the school, as he possessed by far the highest qualifications of any applicant, but orthodox hate followed him, and he failed to secure it. He obtained a country school to which he daily tramped through mud, snow, and storms with the thermometer often 50° below zero, for a paltry apology of a salary. Mr. Dawes has again been defeated for the principalship, as the board hav decided he "is not the proper person." Now, so far as known, his reputation is as unsullied as his ability is unquestioned. But his defeat is the modern mode of Christian persecution for daring to possess an opinion—for asserting his right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." It is just what orthodoxy is doing all the time, and, worst of all, doing it with the aid and consent of Liberals. For I'll venture to say that if Mr. Dawes received but a small per cent of what some Liberals pay to their powerful persecutors, he would be amply sustained.

Mr. Dawes's special desire is to wake up the largely indifferent Liberals of Wisconsin and Minnesota, and, so far as possible, bring them to a knowledge of the purpose and work of the American Secular Union. No one who has read his articles in the Liberal press can fail to question his fitness, for they demonstrate that he is an earnest, philosophic, and scientific thinker and lucid writer. He brings to the discussion of these questions that force which good, pure language and natural dignity impart, and there will be no antics in his advocacy of a philosophy which ought to appeal to advanced intellects. A long time ago, in canvassing the subject, he gave me his idea in these words: "Clownish actions may do in a church, but if we expect Liberalism to expand, our representativ men must possess manners that will pass in good society." His recent contribution, "The Mission of Liberalism," was an admirable consideration of the relativ utility of constructiv and destructiv forces, proving that destructiv arguments necessarily precede constructiv action.

Here is a capable man willing to work in the much-neglected fields of Wisconsin and Minnesota, but if not sustained, he will of course answer calls on any route. Will you Liberals of wealth allow our young friend to depart? There are enough in a few cities alone to sustain a dozen lecturers in those two states. If Liberals in Minnesota and Wisconsin will not keep one man busy, it will not only show their indifference to the world but will be to their lasting disgrace and injury. Nothing exasperates me so much as these contemptible, never-do-anything Liberals, when every orthodox spire is a menace to our liberty and it is the sacred duty of every one of us—vastly more sacred than any Christian duty—to help our Union first to Secularize the state, also to assist the press and lecturers and counteract Christian pernicious influence. A real Liberal will do this to the utmost of his ability when it is properly brought to his attention. If not, he is one of two things—a fool or a fraud.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

State, Nature, and Art.

God ought to be a Protestant. I couldn't help thinking so the day I visited the Philadelphia House of Correction; and if anyone has the patience to hear me out, I think he will agree with me before I conclude this narrativ.

There is a perfect anomaly at the gate of this institution—a civil policeman (though that is not the reason God ought to be a Protestant. Civility is ordinarily incompatible with a blue coat trimmed with brass buttons). This gentleman—I am glad to giv him the title—displayed no unnecessary pomp or patronizing air, as he showed us the way toward the queer-shaped brick building with its radiating corridors, where eleven hundred of the "best citizens of Philadelphia" are being "corrected."

Are you surprised? Well, that is what the keeper told us, when I inquired whether the inmates learned trades or not. "No," said he, in a pious accent (the old gentleman was very pious), "this isn't a penal institution; this is a reformatory institution. Some of the best citizens of Philadelphia come here."

For all I could see, the "best citizens" looked very much like any other citizens. As Piety took us around and showed us their various employments, I discerned no very distinguishing characteristics of goodness or of evil on the many faces which seemed to look up with a slight sigh of relief at a break in the monotony, as one sometimes looks at a clock when it strikes. The nature of people appears much the same, whether in the prisons of the law, of the church, or of toil, or of disease. It is a terrible monotony, that is all. It is a pity that people should build places like this to put other people in, and then go look at them as if the human beings imprisoned there were a menagerie of wild beasts. Yet no worse than the prison-houses of thought, nor the gaunt cells of want, nor the torture-bed of suffering. A convict, a house of correction inmate, is only the outward abscess of an inward sore rotting the vitals of society; and a prison appears to me like a very weak piece of salve put on by those quack doctors called law-makers, with the silly expectation that it will purge the blood of poison.

However, I started out to tell why God should be a Protestant, and this is a long way from the mark.

Piety showed us through the clammy corridors of cells, pointing out all the ingenious contrivances for locking in these "best of citizens," whose only crime, he told us, was drunkenness; permitting us to examin the cells (which were as narrow as a hungry stomach), and make all the uncivil remarks we had a mind to. I attended to that part of the program. I was open in my unqualified disapproval of the "dark cell" to which some of these "best citizens" are treated when they refuse to work or are otherwise unruly. That hideous, tantalizing, bound-in-blackness imposed by the state upon the helpless individual, seems to me a good deal worse crime than anything ascribed to these men and women by the pious keeper. Upon the simple washstand with which each cell is furnished there lie three books—a hymn-book, a Bible, and a smaller edition of the New Testament. Verily religion penetrates the marrow of the coldest stones! What a soft snap that institution must be for religious book-agents and pious publishing houses!

Our attention was called to the shoemaker's department and the tailor's department and the laundry department, in which latter the wage-labor outside is brought into competition with one-third rates—collars one cent, cuffs two cents, and other articles in proportion. A diabolic system of robbery, nothing less. By means of this, the quarry, and various other schemes, the "institution not only supports itself, but yields quite a revenue to the city," Piety complacently informed us.

Patience, my friends. I am coming to God's case now. Take notice that all tradespeople committed to the tender mercies of the house work at their trades and get their board therefor. We are now shown into the chapel. Attendance is compulsory! In reply to our questions regarding the quality of the religion, we are informed it is Methodist at present. "Any Catholic inmates?" "Oh, yes; a large number." "Compelled to attend?" "Yes. But our minister always tells them to obey the priest." "Do you think it just to ask a Catholic to outrage his conscience?" "Well, compulsory attendance is our rule." "You hav a piano?" "Yes, one of the inmates plays." At this point the "committee of entertainment" put in a wedge with a sharp point. "Is the minister a salaried official?" "Yes, sir; oh, yes, sir!" "Ah!" murmurs the unholy committee in an undertone, "couldn't you utilize one of the inmates?"

Now I hope you see why God should be a Protestant. To my mind it is the basest of all base actions for a religionist to steal from God. And since the preachers—especially the Methodist preachers—continually assert that without the spirit of God they are powerless to work good, I say it is a sin and a shame for them to take God's salary. And if I were he I should be a very vigorous protestant. Furthermore I, as a member of the American public, object very strongly to paying the wrong individual, and I move that Congress appoint a committee to take charge of the funds raised for the promotion of God's work. And if he does not call for them in sixty days from date of deposit then they will be returned to their donors. I am tired of paying high rent that some one else may pay high taxes, that some one else may build high steeples that some one else may preach high-sounding jargon in and get a high salary for, only to find out in the end that the money was obtained under false pretenses. Will the member from Grand Rapids please take notice?

From the house of correction to the far-famed zoological gardens is a sudden jump, yet altogether a refreshing one. There is no piety here. There are no Catholic monkeys, no Presbyterian kangaroos, no Baptist otters—no, no. I was about to say no Mormon eagles, but I am afraid I had better say elders. I am afraid the eagles were not monogamic. However, they were not setting themselvs up as guides for their fellow-eagles. Wondrously beautiful were those gardens as they lay all embalmed in the sweet June sunshine! Fairmount park is altogether lovely, and this particular portion is more lovely than all the rest. There is such a wealth of beauty; such a flood of sweetness. No stinted measure; no suggestion of narrowed boundaries. From the hedges the rose-leaves come showering down like a rain of kisses, lying red on the earth's upturned lips; the ground vibrates with poetry; the air quivers with song. Our pre-Adamite ancestors—some of them looked very wise, with their venerable beards; their hands on their knees, man-fashion; their philosophic craniums, no doubt as well filled with profound reflections on the inferiority of the female brain as those of some other philosophers who hav been airing their musty ideas of late—our ancestors, as I was saying, hav a delightful Eden. And it would be a beautiful resting-place on the "holy Sabbath;" a sweet escape from the tormenting preacher; a glorious lesson to point the inquirer up the long ascent of progress, but I understand the Sunday law decrees otherwise. I do not wonder at the use of the phrase, "Smart as a Philadelphia lawyer." It must indeed require a very large brain, and one deserving Dickens's title, the Artful Dodger, to retain and defend all the absurd, unnatural, and abominable laws with which the Quaker City is cursed. Not more cramped the aristocratic Chinese foot than Philadelphia nature by this accursed iron shoe of bigot law. It requires a vigorous local agitation, a continual "fuss," an energetic upheaval of independent thought, to make manifest the odiousness of this tyranny; and I hope our Philadelphia friends will go about rooting up facts in the ins and outs of the city, and open the fall campaign by a determined attack on this ecclesiastical insult. Let the voices from the alleys and the cellars and the attics, from factory and furnace and all the treadmills of toil, cry up against this outrage, which chains their liberty to rotting corpses on the only day when the stern struggle for existence relaxes its throttling grasp, and, pointing to the closed places of amusement and instruction, says, with grim satire, "Rest."

For a consideration of $200,000 the art gallery was opened to the public on Sunday—a remarkable concession. There are some magnificent paintings and sculptures there, and I was pleased to notice that, notwithstanding the fact that modest Anthony lectured in the city, Sunday, May 27th, the statues had not donned clothes; and, judging from the throng of people that surged through this painted city of the beautiful, the carved thoughts of the masters and the spirituel canvas of the color-dreamers had rather the larger audience. Thus the good, the beautiful, the true, though pleading they reach out their pure white hands through the dark prison bars of hate; though their voices are hushed by the gags of force, and the tyranny of base souls has sought to steep them in the hated rust of its own chains, still, still they triumph. And wherever nature has spoken humanity has listened; where love's dews hav fallen the flowers hav bloomed; wings unpinioned must upward float; back of the clouds the starshine smiles.

And with the certainty that as the ideal of freedom rises over the world, like dawn upon the mountain-tops, the shackles of this fair Eastern city will sink soundless into the past's deep sea, I bid good-bye to my pleasant friends, and once more am borne away into the purple of the evening and the hills.

VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE.

A Dangerous Parallel.

From the American Sentinel, Oakland, Cal.

Alongside of the statements of the Elgin Sunday-law convention, given in a foregoing article, we desire to place some facts of history which reveal a threatening danger that the American people do not dream of. By this we intend to show that it was in this way precisely that the union of church and state was formed in the fourth century, out of which grew the papacy in its highest pretensions. There is no need of much argument; all we hav to do is to quote the history, and the parallel can be so plainly seen that argument is unnecessary.

Neander says of the fourth century:

As is evident from the synodal laws of the fourth century, worldly-minded bishops, instead of caring for the salvation of their flocks, were often but too much inclined to travel about, and entangle themselvs in worldly concerns (Church History, vol. ii, p. 16; Torrey's edition, Boston, 1857).

So it is now with these Sunday-law preachers, in their working up of religio-political conventions and their lobbying almost every legislature in the land. But what was the purpose of these worldly-minded bishops in entangling themselvs in worldly concerns? Neander tells:

This theocratical theory was already the prevailing one in the time of Constantine; and . . . bishops voluntarily made themselvs dependent on him by their disputes, and by their determination to make use of the power of the state for the furtherance of their own aims (Ib., p. 132).

What, then, were their aims? Their first and greatest aim was the exaltation of themselvs, and second only to that was the exaltation of Sunday. These two things had been their principal aims, and especially of the bishops of Rome, for more than a hundred years, when Constantine gave them a chance to make their aims effectual by the power of the state. The first assertion of the arrogant pretensions of the bishop of Rome to power over the whole church was made in behalf of Sunday by Victor, who was bishop of Rome from A.D. 193 to 202.

He wrote an imperious letter to the Asiatic prelates, commanding them to imitate the example of the western Christians with respect to the time of celebrating Easter [that is, commanding them to celebrate it always on Sunday]. The Asiatics answered this lordly requisition . . . with great spirit and resolution, that they would by no means depart, in this manner, from the customs handed down to them by their ancestors. Upon this the thunder of excommunication began to roar. Victor, exasperated by this resolute answer of the Asiatic bishops, broke communion with them, pronounced them unworthy of the name of his brethren, and excluded them from all fellowship with the church of Rome (Mosheim, Church History, 2d Century, part II, chap. v, par. 11).

One of the earliest things in which these church managers secured from Constantine the use of the power of the state, was the famous edict prohibiting certain kinds of work on "the venerable day of the sun." That edict runs thus:

Let all the judges and townspeople and the occupation of all trades rest on the venerable day of the sun; but let those who are situated in the country, freely and at full liberty attend to the business of agriculture; because it often happens that no other day is so fit for sowing corn and planting vines; lest, the critical moment being let slip, men should lose the commodities granted by heaven.

This edict was issued March 7, A.D. 321. It will be seen by this edict that only judges and townspeople and mechanics were commanded to rest on Sunday. If mechanics were allowed to work, the spiritual temple could not be built "without the noise of the hammer;" don't you see? But this did not satisfy the political managers of the churches for any great length of time.

By a law of the year 386, those older changes effected by the Emperor Constantine were more rigorously enforced, and, in general, civil transactions of every kind on Sunday were strictly forbidden. Whoever transgressed was to be considered, in fact, as guilty of sacrilege (Neander, ib., p. 300).

But these laws only prohibited work on Sunday; pleasure-seeking, games, etc., were not even yet prohibited. Consequently a church convention held at Carthage in 401—

Resolved to petition the emperor that the public shows might be transferred from the Christian Sunday and from feast days to some other days of the week (Ib.).

But what was the purpose of all these Sunday laws and petitions for Sunday laws? From the first Sunday law enacted by Constantine to the last one enacted by any other emperor; from the first petition presented by the political bishops of the fourth century to the last one circulated by the political preachers of Illinois, the sole reason and purpose has always been—

So that the day might be devoted with less interruption to the purposes of devotion; and in order that the devotion of the faithful might be free from all disturbance (Ib., pp. 297, 301).

But what was it that disturbed the devotion of the faithful on Sundays in the fourth century?

Owing to the prevailing passion at that time, especially in the large cities, to run after the various public shows, it so happened that when these spectacles fell on the same days which had been consecrated by the church to some religious festival, they proved to be a great hindrance to the devotion of Christians, though chiefly, it must be allowed, to those whose Christianity was the least an affair of the life and of the heart (Ib., p. 300).

But, again, how could a theater or a circus in one part of the city hinder the devotion of the faithful in another, and perhaps distant, part of the city, or even in the country? Thus:

Church teachers . . . were, in truth, often forced to complain that in such competitions the theater was vastly more frequented than the church (Ib.).

Oh, yes! That is the secret of the hindrance to their devotion. If there was a circus or a public show on Sunday, it would get a great many spectators, and "so break up a great many congregations;" the church-members would go to the circus, and "let the hour of worship go by unheeded;" and so their devotion was greatly disturbed and hindered. Don't you see? Just here, please read again the quotations from Dr. Everts's speech in the Elgin convention, where he complains of the Sunday train and the Sunday newspaper. Is not this thing a perfect repetition of that in the fourth century?

But yet those ambitious prelates of the fourth century were not content with stopping all manner of work and closing public places on Sunday. They had secured the power of the state so far, and they determined to carry it yet further, and use the power of the state to compel everybody to worship according to the dictates of the church. And one of the greatest fathers of the church was father to this theory. That was the great church father and Catholic saint Augustine—and, by the way, he is grandfather to National Reform, too, as we shall prove one of these days. Augustine taught that

It is indeed better that men should be brought to serve God by instruction than by fear of punishment or by pain. But because the former means are better, the latter must not therefore be neglected. . . . Many must often be brought back to their Lord, like wicked servants, by the rod of temporal suffering, before they attain to the highest grade of religious development (Schaff, Church History, vol. ii, sec. 27).

And says Neander:

It was by Augustine, then, that a theory was proposed and founded, which . . . contained the germ of that whole system of spiritual despotism, of intolerance and persecution, which ended in the tribunals of the Inquisition (Neander, ib., p. 217).

Of that whole fourth century Sunday-law movement, from beginning to end, Neander, with direct reference to those Sunday laws, says:

In this way the church received help from the state for the furtherance of her ends (Ib., p. 301).

That is the indisputable truth of the matter. And it is just as indisputably true that this Sunday-law movement in our day in this nation is only another attempt of the church to seize upon the power of the state and use it to further her own aims. And just as surely as these political preachers of our day secure the power and the recognition of the state in their first step, they will carry it to the last step, and the logical end to which it was carried in the fourth century, and afterward in the working of the theory of Augustine. The church of our day can no more safely be trusted with political power than could that of the fourth century, or of any other century. The only safety for the people, and the only security for the state, is to make it perfectly certain that the church shall never receive the help of the state for the furtherance of her own ends; and that she shall never obtain any recognition at all by the civil power, beyond that granted to every other person or class in the nation.

By these evidences from the fourth century, as well as by the evidences from the church conventions of our own day, it is demonstrated again that there is no such thing as a civil Sunday, and that there is no such thing as civil Sunday laws. The first Sunday law that ever was enacted was at the request of the church; it was in behalf of the church; and it was expressly to help the church. The call for Sunday laws now is by the church; and wherever they are enacted, it is in behalf of the church, and to help the church; and it is so throughout history. The keeping of Sunday is not a civil duty, and cannot of right be made a civil duty. Sunday is wholly an ecclesiastical institution, and the keeping of it can only be enjoined or enforced by ecclesiastical power. And whenever the civil power attempts to enjoin or enforce it, the civil power in that is made subordinate to the ecclesiastical, and becomes only an instrument of ecclesiastical oppression.

That is the use that was made of Sunday laws in the fourth century; it is the use that has been made of them in the United States within the last three years; and that is the use that will be made of them in days to come as surely as the churches secure this help of the state in the furtherance of their own political and ambitious aims. Through Sunday laws the papacy was developed in the fourth century; and through Sunday laws there will yet be developed a living image of the papacy in this country. Therefore we are, and everybody else ought to be, uncompromisingly opposed to the enactment or enforcement of any manner of Sunday laws.

God and the Bible.

Gen. xix, 1: "And there came two angels to Sodom at even." Verse 5: "And they [the rabble] called unto Lot, and said unto him, Where are the men which came to thee this night? Bring them out unto us that we may know them." Verse 8: "Behold now, I hav two daughters which hav not known man: let me, I pray you, bring them out unto you, and do ye to them as is good in your eyes." What an estimate that special favorit of God must hav placed upon the virtue of his daughters! There are many men whom God never condescended to speak to or instruct who would never make such a proposition, and who would spill their hearts' blood before they would see their daughters sacrificed.

This serves as a clew to the enlightenment and moral standing of the people, when God was talking with his special favorits and sending his angels and agents. The rank and file of men were given to sodomy, and God's favorits were little better, as will be found by following the story of Lot. Such things could happen only among a people so bestially ignorant and debased as to be elevated but little above the level of the brute. The more ignorant a people are, the nearer they are to God. As man mounts upward in the scale of civilization, he is prone to leave the gods behind, and gets along far better without than with them.

Verse 26: "But his wife looked back from behind him and she became a pillar of salt." No wonder this Munchausenism has been preserved and come down to us, for I am sure it was well salted.

Verses 30–38 are too indecent to be repeated. Let the Liberal mark them in his private Bible and ask the Christian if God ever so framed circumstances as to make it necessary for his favored ones to commit incest.

Here we hav the history of a family so precious in the sight of God that he sent his special agent to conduct them out of a city which he meant to destroy. But before the smoke had fairly lifted from the smouldering mist of the city, this man of God was up into the mountain in a cave drunk and sleeping with his own daughters. God did not kill Lot or his daughters for their beastly conduct, but he did kill the wife and mother for disobeying orders. Hence we are led to infer that looking back when commanded not to is a greater crime in the sight of God than for a man to get drunk and sleep with his own daughters. To obey such a God and imitate such a people is to barter away our civilization for the animalism of such a people.

Gen. xx, 6: "For I also withheld thee from sinning against me." Yes, God withholds one from sinning and givs another over to believe a lie that he may be damned. If such a God should be sent as a missionary among the Kaffirs, it would be more congenial for him and better for civilization. But I should pity the Kaffirs. Why did not God keep David from killing Uriah and from stealing his wife? To follow the example of such heavenly crawfish, one must go constantly backward. Only this morning I was told of a man who still believes in a flat earth. "Is he not very pious?" I asked. "Oh, yes," replied my informant; "he believes it would send a man to hell to split a little wood for a fire on Sunday." Now, that man is just as sure of heaven as though he held the key to the main passage. Men must be made fools of here in order to be made happy hereafter. Grand scheme that.

Verse 12: "And yet indeed she is my sister. She is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother, and she became my wife." Verse 2: "And Abimilech king of Gerar sent and took Sarah." Thus it would appear that in these good old times when men were on such intimate terms with God they "took" women about as their fancy led, without regard to numbers, or the ties of relationship, or the wishes of the women they "took;" and, further, that on occasion these men of God could lie like troopers, for when Abraham denied that Sarah was his wife, he lied. The end may hav justified the means, but how should a man under the immediate direction of God get pushed into such a corner?

If Liberals would be diligent in exposing the absurdities and crudities of the Bible, the public stomach would soon become so nauseated that instead of trying to push it into the schools it would cease to be introduced into good society.

We hav a Christian woman living in this vicinity who lost a son in the army. He was an idle spendthrift. In order to obtain a pension she had to swear that she was dependent on him for support. Everybody knew that she swore to a lie. She knew it, too, but in extenuation she said, "When the oath was administered I was careful not to kiss the Bible."

These Bible stories of incest and brutality, of rape and robbery, of lies and deception, are well calculated to develop just such Christians, and the crop has been abundant.

Gen. xxv, 1: "Then again Abraham took a wife, and her name was Keturah." Splendid lessons for the young. Men whom God stoops to giv council to, taking wife after wife, held up as patterns for the young to follow. They are made to believe that Brigham Young was a monster of iniquity, and at the same time taught that a man who was one of God's most intimate henchmen could hav twenty wives to his one and still be the wisest man in all the earth. Christians will probably become consistent when they outgrow their Christianity.

Verse 6: "But unto the sons of the concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts." Is not this enough to shame a Turk? When God was daily talking to Abraham, why did he not tell him that so many wives and concubines were shamefully disgraceful?

I am unable to see that these talks of God with these old Bible worthies were of any more benefit to them or to the world than his talks with Mahound. This leaves the Christian in a dilemma, one horn of which he is compelled to take. These pretended talks of God with men in the olden time were either the greatest lies ever written or else that God did not know that deception and fraud, plunder and concubinage, were crimes.

Verse 21: "And Isaac entreated the Lord for his wife because she was barren, and the Lord was entreated of him."

If Isaac had not entreated the Lord, of course Rebekah would hav remained barren. Oh, what an unchangeable God, to be blown about by every wind of entreaty!

The instances where God changed and repented are numerous. And yet in the face of all this the Christian opens his prayer with: "O thou great and unchangeable God!"

> The Christian is zealous and always persistent,
> Like the mule he is stubborn, but never consistent.

In verses 22–26 will be found the story of the conception and birth of Esau and Jacob. I want the reader to look over these verses and ask himself if God had nothing of more importance than this indecent balderdash to deliver to the world, and also what great loss the world would hav sustained if it had never been written.

In verse 23 it is decreed that the elder shall serve the younger. More heavenly justice. No man with an inkling of justice would want one child to serve another, much less a God who has declared that he is "no respecter of persons."

Notwithstanding the Bible is the word of God, it is one of the most unreasonable and contradictory books which has ever been written. No doubt it is all as clear as mud to the Christian, but I would rather be born blind than see through Christian spectacles.

Gen. xxvi, 7: "And the men of the place asked him of his wife, and he said, She is my sister." Here Isaac, another man of God, is made to lie about his wife as did Abraham. It does beat all how these holy men do get cornered so as to be compelled to lie. It would seem as though trusting in the Lord was no great moral help, after all.

Gen. xxix, 25: "And it came to pass in the morning behold it was Leah, and he said to Laban, What is this thou hast done unto me? Did I not serve thee for Rachel? Wherefore hast thou beguiled me?" Here is a plain statement that a woman was bargained away without her consent—so much work for so much woman. Then a homely, blear-eyed sister given, instead of the beautiful woman for whom Jacob had so faithfully served.

While God was superintending matters, why did he allow such a scurvy trick to be played on one of his pets? In the face of such lessons, ministers are boasting that "women are the main pillars in the church." The sooner the time comes when women are no longer made the sport of the priesthood, the better it will be for the world.

Gen. xxx, 6: "And Rachel said, God hath judged and hath also heard my voice, and hath given me a son." It appears that Rachel had no children, and complained to Jacob, who got indignant, so she gave Jacob her handmaid Bilhah, and she had a son, and God is made to sanction this dirty proceeding. Oh, the Bible is a great book! When it is fully introduced into the schools, will not the youth of the land get a "send off," and will not every minister hav his Bilhah?

I ask to hav the whole chapter read carefully, if not prayerfully. Then I want everyone to ponder this question, Is God the author of such unholy spawn, and for what purpose did he write such disgusting gibberish? Were these the best thoughts which could occupy the mind of a great being who presided over the destiny of the universe?

What would be thought of a people to-day who should follow the example of these men of God? If this low-down balderdash is the word of God, instead of sending missionaries to enlighten the heathen they ought to be sent to the courts of heaven to civilize the Christian's God. Think of a holy old rake whom God is directing having a score of wives, and these wives bantering with each other and trying to buy the services of a common husband with a lot of mandrakes. And think of putting such holy slaver into the schools, as a finishing touch to inoculate the youth of the land with the slaver of a mad dog.

God never had anything to do with such disgusting nonsense. He never wrote a book, and never talked with men. It is all a wicked lie, told by selfish men to deceive and enslave an ignorant people.

Who with a well-balanced mind believes that God sent an angel to call the attention of Jacob to the kind of male cattle which were brought into requisition to propagate their kind, and the manner of doing it (Gen. xxxi, 11, 12)? What benefit has this silly story of ring-streaked, speckled, and grizzled cattle been to the world, anyway? Could not God hav rummaged around the universe and found something of more importance to transmit to the children of men?

Gen. xxxiv, 2: "And when Shechem, the son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the country, saw her, he took her, and lay with her, and defiled her."

This again givs us a clew to the men and manners of the Bible times. Women were entirely subject to the brute force of half-civilized men. It appears that men simply "took" women as their lust and inclination might lead them, without any regard to their likes or desires.

Verse 12: "Ask me never so much dower and gift, and I giv you according as ye shall say unto me, but giv me the damsel to wife." Is any other evidence required to show that women were in the market; bought and sold like cattle among these men of God? Women are the "pillars of the church," and they will respect themselvs all the more when they stand from under and let the rotten old fabric fall.

Verse 22: "Only herein will the men consent unto us . . . if every male among us be circumcised as they are circumcised." In this the barbarous superstition of God's people is made apparent. What had this savage act of mutilation to do with morality or human progress? God might just as well require every male child to hav an ear cropped.

Verse 26: "And they slew Hamor and Shechem with the edge of the sword."

If the whole of the thirty-fourth chapter is read, it will appear that Shechem, the son of Hamor, debauched Dinah, the daughter of Jacob. Then Simeon and Levi, the sons of Jacob, slew Hamor and Shechem and "spoiled the city," and took their sheep and oxen, asses, and all their wealth, and their little ones, and their wives they took captiv.

In the first place, it would seem like a big job for two men to take a city. In the second place, where was the justice? If an Englishman should come over here and defile an American girl, would anyone say that it would be an act of justice to plunder and destroy the city of London? When the habits and practices of the people in Bible times are studied, the idea of such a rude people being under the immediate control of God will appear most preposterous. It is most wonderful that God has always shown such a partiality for ignorance and brutality. In witchcraft times it was believed that God sanctioned the murder of those denominated witches. So in the days of the Inquisition, God sanctioned the torture and execution of heretics. God had just as much to do with the transactions of these semi-barbarians as he had with the hanging of witches and the burning of heretics.

Gen. xxxv, 11: "I am God almighty." Would not U. S. Grant hav lowered himself in the minds of American citizens if he had boasted of being "The great American general?" The devil is too modest to make such a boast as that. This is what I call Jehovahly bombast.

Verse 22: "Reuben went and lay with Bilhah, his father's concubine." A man of God with a concubine! God on familiar terms with men with scores of fancy women about them. The son of a godly man lying with his father's concubine. Think of it, O ye Christian women—ye pillars of the church! Is it not better to be godless than to hold up such beastly practices before the young as worthy of imitation? For, if these practices were followed by the men of God, are we not bound to imitate them? To follow the teachings of the Bible is to go back to these filthy practices.

Gen. xxxviii, 2: "And Judah saw there a daughter of a certain Canaanite; and he took her," etc. Yes, he "took her." All that one of these godly lechers had to do was to "take" a woman when his inclination led him, without her consent or without as much regard for her feelings as would be manifested by a male brute. We hav only to study those people to understand what a retrograde movement it would be to make the teachings of the Bible the rule of action in this country.

Verse 9 savors too much of beastliness to be quoted. But let the Liberal mark the passage, and then in a proper spirit call the attention of Christians to the savory morsel, and ask them if God is the author of language and thoughts the expression of which would not be tolerated in the lowest bar-room. Is not this a choice bit of literature for young girls in school? Yet Christians are constantly talking about godless schools because the Bible is excluded. Where is Anthony? I wonder if this kind of mental garbage is to his taste? Judge Benedict has sent many to prison, but if anything more revolting has ever been spread before a court it has not come to my knowledge. There is no clear-minded man who does not abhor such a sickening stench. And then to think that every child who attends a Sunday-school must be taught that such stuff is the word of God. Oh, horrible! One would think that a great God who spoke a family of worlds into existence might hav thoughts of something more edifying to write about than such disgusting obscenity.

The whole of this chapter should be carefully read and noted. If God is the author of this chapter, he is the embodiment of filth, and not a God of purity. Is it possible for anyone to show that any good has ever come from the reading of this chapter? Can such abominable trash result in any good to the race? Was anybody ever made better by reading it? The fact that people can be imposed upon with such outlandish slush shows how far they are below anything like a perfect civilization. If Liberals would be diligent in exposing these abhorrent and unclean portions of scripture, and in showing up the inconsistency of teaching the young that such loathsome obscenity is the word of God, I am inclined to think that the clamor about godless schools would soon cease. It is a duty which every Liberal owes to himself and to the rising generation to do this. Never can the young be trained to pure thoughts and lofty aims while they regard the Bible, with all its filth and absurdities, as the fountain of pureness and the source of wisdom. JOHN PECK.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

THE "LIFE EVERLASTING."

The best evidence we hav of the durability of human life consists in the fact that notwithstanding the many millions that die annually from natural causes, and the supplementary millions swept away by war, famin, and pestilence, to say nothing of shipwrecks and railway disasters, the population of the globe continues rapidly to increase; so much so that were it not for the continual throwing out there would be barely standing-room for the inhabitants, much less adequate means of subsistence. Eighteen centuries ago a Christian writer ventured to predict that the whole world would not contain the books that might be written on one subject alone. This was perhaps an exaggeration, although the scribes hav been at it ever since as if in fulfilment of the prophecy, but it has not been, that I am aware of, until the present year of grace, that a single book has been written on the subject from a common-sense standpoint. A writer born and reared in an atmosphere of Freethought could not fully enter into the subject. It is only those who hav, like myself, been cradled in superstition and hav shaken themselvs free, that can do justice to it.

How is it that among the million dupes who hav departed this life in "sure and certain hope of a joyful resurrection," of saints who hav died in the odor of sanctity, and of martyrs who straight from the stake hav entered into "the joy of their Lord," not one has come back to testify to the truth of the Christian religion or to prove its fallacy? The reason is obvious. As individuals they hav one and all ceased to exist, aud all that remains of them must be sought for in that grand dust-hole or manure heap, the grave. The orthodox notion that they are either twanging harps or praying for cooling lotions in another world is about as absurd as the story of the fall, and of man's redemption. If, as they say, the present life is one of probation only, how is it that good men do not grow better as they grow older, whereas the reverse is most frequently the case?

Youthful saints and sincere believers—and there are but few such—either die young, or outliv their faith and become Freethinkers. The surest way to become convinced of the fallacy of the Christian religion is, honestly and sincerely, to endeavor to act according to it. The best antidote to Christian superstition is an intimate knowledge of the Christian Bible. Read it with your own eyes, and do not use another man's spectacles. And above all, exercise your common sense.

Believers in ghosts and apparitions, including modern Spiritualists, hav an idea that the souls of those who hav departed this life still exist in an individual form, which is, however, invisible and intangible except to those in a similar condition. In support of this hypothesis they quote the Apostle Paul, "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body." What Paul really meant was evidently to the effect that there is an empty bottle, and there is a bottle of whisky. But the utility of the empty bottle is one thing, and the power of the whisky another. When the whisky is absorbed by the owner thereof, it soon loses its individuality, and evaporates into thin air. It is easy enough to refill the bottle, but impossible to do so with the same whisky. We know not what science may achieve in some future day, but at present it has not learned the way to condense the fumes of the alcohol after it has passed through the human organism, to make it answer the purpose again, and to repeat the process ad infinitum. Neither is it desirable to do such a thing. By all means let us hav something fresh. The grain from which the whisky of the future will be made is not yet sown in the earth, and then it will hav to go through all the processes of germination, vegetation, fermentation, and distillation, and after that a long probation in cask and bottle, before it becomes wholesome and fit for human consumption. It is just the same with the spirit that animates our natural bodies. We cannot use and retain it at the same time—

Like the dew on the mountain,
Like the foam on the river,
Like the bubble on the fountain,
'Tis gone, and forever!

And yet the human race, so far from becoming extinct, continues to increase and multiply and replenish the earth. Whole tribes and nations may indeed pass away, but there is an endless "survival of the fittest." To wish the survival of those who are not fit, as Christian philanthropists affect to do, is flat rebellion against the law of nature. And even we who think ourselvs—perhaps not without reason—the best and wisest of mankind will hav in time to giv place to a new generation, born under new conditions and with new surroundings, who will uproot our old landmarks and remove our old limitations. To suppose that a man was wiser or spoke with more authority because he lived and spoke eighteen hundred years ago is one of the popular delusions that will hav to be set aside and exploded before Freethought can make any headway with the masses. The theory of eternal life for the individual man, which Jesus taught and promised, needs no refutation, for it is already refuted. If Jesus be still alive (and if his biographers are to be trusted, he has again assumed his natural body), why does he not come forward and show himself? Or if that be infra dig and impossible, why does he not appear by proxy? If such an individual ever existed—and that is doubtful—the species is become extinct like the dodo. Thinkers and theorists there may be who assume like the Apostle Paul that they "bear about in their bodies the marks of the Lord Jesus"—not the manual and pedal "stigmata" as understood by the ignorant Catholics, but a similarity of life and experience culminating in a fanciful exaltation of spirit known as the "kingdom of heaven." But what good does it produce, beyond a temporary abstraction from the ills of life? Common sense, meanwhile, tills the soil, makes roads, constructs bridges, and opens up hitherto undeveloped resources. The theoretical Christian goes the way of his predecessors and sinks into oblivion. Common sense alone makes the "life everlasting" practicable, and the world worth living in. OUTIS.

Mr. Palmer's Great Work and Heroic Death.

From the New York Sun of July 27th.

The late Mr. Courtlandt Palmer accomplished the surprising feat of making fashionable in New York a sort of discussion which before had been frowned upon as to the last degree pernicious, and especially unbefitting polite and conservativ society. He set people to thinking and talking over moral and religious questions, which they had not dared to consider, and made familiar to them views from which they had turned in alarm as morally poisonous and soul-destroying.

The Nineteenth Century Club was established as a Free-thinking debating society, and not many years ago it would hav been avoided and denounced as an institution for the propagation of Infidelity and odious Radicalism. Yet under Mr. Palmer's lead the club received the stamp of fashionable approval, and its discussions hav been carried on before crowded assemblages of ladies and gentlemen in full evening dress, and chiefly from the most conservativ and even Philistine circles of society.

Audiences so composed listened with polite attention to speakers whose very names had been loathsome to them, and whose notions and theories were utterly subversiv of what they held it sacrilege and infamy to doubt or deny. Beautiful women who had trembled at the mere thought that there was such skepticism in the world, for the first time heard it expressed and defended. Where they had been sure there was only one possible side they saw that other people found many sides and qualifications innumerable, and that what to them seemed indisputable was the subject of endless disputation, or was actually beyond the possibility of reasonable proof.

Therefore those evenings at the Nineteenth Century Club introduced most of the audience into a new intellectual world and induced in them reflections altogether novel. It is true that Mr. Palmer fairly apportioned the disputants so that each side should hav its due representation, the champions of faith wrestling with the exponents of doubt; but his innovation, wonderfully successful considering the circumstances, was in introducing the discussion at all, and in securing toleration for it.

What his own views were never was doubtful. For many years past his associations, his sympathies, and his convictions had been with the most advanced of what are called the Freethinkers, so that at one time he thought of establishing a temple for the preaching of their negations. He was an extreme Radical in religion and an extreme Socialist in politics, and, brave and honest man as he was, he never sought to hide his true colors. No Radical and no Agnostic who spoke at the Nineteenth Century Club could go further than he himself was willing to go, and yet by his fair spirit and because of his genuin enthusiasm for free discussion, he was always able to bring into the debates clergymen and laymen to contend for the opposing views.

That was a remarkable thing to do, and in its way the club was really a great transforming power among the very part of the community whom it is the most difficult to turn to free and serious thought. He made even Philistia think, broadened its narrow view, and inspired it with some intellectual courage. Of course, the time was in his favor, for people are getting away from their old moorings, but he was astonishingly successful in profiting by the situation.

Mr. Palmer's deep interest in the undertaking was shown in a letter written by him on the day before his death, and in view of that probability. "I want above all things," he said, "to hav the Nineteenth Century Club kept alive." And his attitude as to religion was indicated in another letter asking that Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Thaddeus B. Wakeman should speak over the ashes of his cremated body; that he should not be buried "from any Christian church," and that no "Christian hymns" should be sung. He met unflinchingly the fate from which no man can escape, and passed into the unknown, saying, "I suffer no fear in the presence of what Christians generally look upon as the king of terrors."

AGNOSTIC DEATHBEDS.

From the Evening Sun of July 26th.

The death of Courtlandt Palmer is another of the refutations of the assertions that the deathbed of the unbeliever is an agonizing one. Mr. Palmer seems to hav entered the dark valley with serenity and composure fully equal to the many graphic pictures of the last hours of saints which are to be found in religious literature. If it be true that the supremest victory of life is the conquering of the fear of death as a certain school of philosophers, not religious, hold, Mr. Palmer has certainly compassed that victory. He faced the great mystery as Ralph Waldo Emerson, as Dr. George M. Beard, as Matt Carpenter, as John Randolph did, with entire confidence that whatever lay beyond was well, and with the impression that if there was another existence to which death was the threshold it was in accordance with that law of progression and evolution to higher things which is the recognized law on earth.

No one who reads that wonderfully impressiv account of Mr. Palmer's death which appears in the Sun of this morning can doubt now that he was sincere in the views which he held. He did not approach death experimentally, as did Beard and Carpenter. His intellect was busy with higher processes of thought than theirs. "I want you one and all," said he to his family just before he closed his eyes to receive the anesthetic preliminary to the surgeon's knife; "I want you, one and all, to tell the whole world that you hav seen a Freethinker die without the least fear of what the hereafter may be." And these were almost his last words. Surely this was a triumph for Palmer, though great may be the shock of it to those who trust in the consolations of religion for their last moments. Here was a man, still young, blessed with every material source of happiness, who had never had a proper desire ungratified, who rejoiced in a delightful home, who had resources for the keenest intellectual enjoyments—approaching death, not nonchalantly nor with flippant affectation of indifference, but like a philosopher about to put his philosophy to the supremest test. He seemed to rejoice in the sense of victory, and to be anxious that the world should know of his experience.

Dr. Beard approached dissolution as a scientist. Like Mr. Palmer, he was an Agnostic who neither denied nor affirmed the possibility of those things which to sacred men are deemed certainties. Dr. Beard, though an alienist who made great reputation in the treatment of nervous and mental diseases of others, carried his own nerves on his cuticle. He was high-strung, capable of periods of great mental exhilaration, and a man of supreme intellectual courage. When it was perilous, even physically perilous, for anybody to doubt the sanity of Guiteau, Beard, utterly careless of the threatened loss of his practice and even of his life, gave to the wretch a most exhaustiv examination, both before and behind the prison bars, and he staked his reputation on the assertion that the poor wretch was the victim of irresponsible delusion that would make his hanging a judicial murder, and he did not flinch in asserting this then most obnoxious opinion.

Only a few months later Beard lay down upon his bed in an uptown hotel to die. Pneumonia had fastened upon his delicate lungs, and he knew that his illness was mortal. Did he then bewail his fate—cut off in his prime, and when his life-plans were far-reaching, and aimed for the benefit of mankind? Instead, he dictated to his wife his experiences as a sufferer. He jotted down with feeble hand what Beard intellectual made of Beard moribund, and when his breath came fast and short and with the agony of pain from each inhalation he still made effort to preserve his experience with the hope that physicians might thereby learn something of this disease which would help them master it when others were afflicted. Once when he returned from the realms of unconsciousness he made a feeble effort to tell its story, and the only agony he seemed to suffer during his illness arose from his failure more fully and satisfactorily to preserve the record of his illness.

We hav read of suicides who with curious intent hav swallowed poison or filled their lungs with noxious gas and hav set down in a diary their impressions until the words became vague, the lines faint, and then the pencil dropped. And such record possesses a ghastly fascination for those who read it, like the echo of one who shouts as he passes over the Styx; but Beard thought he was serving humanity when he gave his last moments to the record of his dying experience, and he was right. Physicians hav read that record with profit, and perhaps hav been enabled to save lives thereby.

Matt Carpenter's dying hours were less unselfish, although strikingly and intensely dramatic. He watched the play of disease on himself as a naturalist watches experiments or a scientist a chemical action. He knew that his disease (Bright's disease of the kidneys) had passed to its third or incurable stage, and he gratified a curiosity, abnormal and painful to his friends, by watching himself the tests which the physicians make to indicate the progress of the disease. He procured chemicals and made the tests himself, with the interest but personal indifference of a young physician in a laboratory. Sometimes he would say to his partner, "At this rate there are two months left me," or again he would assert that nature and medicin had set back the disease a little. One morning after examining a test which plainly indicated that dissolution was not far away, he spoke of it calmly to his partner, discussed it as he would a piece of testimony that he intended to introduce in a law case, and then quietly made some notes of a speech he intended to deliver in the Senate. He entered the Senate chamber, his face whiter than his hair, bantered and perplexed a fellow-Senator on the subject of establishing a consular court in China. With one hand in his pocket and all his exquisit melody of voice and charm of diction, he delivered a speech on this unusually dry subject that entranced the Senate, and then as unconcernedly as though going to the restaurant for lunch, put on his heavy fur-lined overcoat, stood at the door of the Senate a moment, looking around for what he knew was his last glance, and quitted the chamber forever. And while he was making the speech, with his hand in his pocket, he held in it the vial which contained the test that told the story of his speedy death.

Mr. Bradlaugh's Oaths Bill and the Division Upon It.

Mr. Bradlaugh has carried his Oaths bill through committee of the House and through the "progress stage," and it is now on its way to the third reading. When this will occur no one knows, one or two members having given notice that they will ask to postpone the reading till next January. The bill as amended in committee is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the queen's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

"1. Every person upon objecting to be sworn, and stating, as the ground of such objection, either that he has no religious belief, or that the taking of an oath is contrary to his religious belief, shall be permitted to make his solemn affirmation instead of taking an oath in all places and for all purposes where an oath is or shall be required by law, which affirmation shall be of the same force and effect as if he had taken the oath; and if any person making such affirmation shall willfully, falsely, and corruptly affirm any matter or thing which, if deposed on oath, would hav amounted to willful and corrupt perjury, he shall be liable to prosecution, indictment, sentence, and punishment in all respects as if he had committed willful and corrupt perjury.

"2. Every such affirmation shall be as follows: 'I, A. B., do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm,' and then proceed with the words of the oath prescribed by law, omitting any words of imprecation or calling to witness.

"3. Where an oath has been duly administered and taken, the fact that the person to whom the same was administered had, at the time of taking such oath, no religious belief, shall not for any purpose affect the validity of such oath.

"4. Every affirmation in writing shall commence: 'I, ————, of————, do solemnly and sincerely affirm,' and the form in lieu of jurat shall be, 'Affirmed at ————, this ———— of ————, 18—. Before me.'

"5. If any person to whom an oath is administered desires to swear with uplifted hand, in the form and manner in which an oath is usually administered in Scotland, he shall be permitted so to do, and the oath shall be administered to him in such form and manner without further question.

"6. The acts mentioned in the schedule to this act are hereby repealed to the extent in the third column of the schedule mentioned.

"7. This act may be cited as the Oaths act, 1888.

"SCHEDULE.

"Session and Chapter.	Title.	Extent of Repeal.
"32 and 33 Vict. c. 68	The Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869.	Section four.
"33 and 34 Vict. c. 49	The Evidence Amendment. Act, 1870."	The entire act.

The bill in its present form is not even satisfactory to some of the Freethinkers of England. The clause which we hav italicized is an amendment moved by Mr. Bradlaugh himself, who "carried all he desired and rejected all to which he was opposed," and is objectionable to such men as Morley, Labouchere, Trevelyan, and Foote, of the Freethinkers, who claim that it authorizes an inquisition by courts into a man's belief, and that Atheists will be prejudiced in legal matters thereby. Mr. Morley said that the clause was going practically to ask the man a question and to make him assert before the judge and jury that he had no religious belief. That assertion on his part in many cases might and probably would damage his evidence. It had been said that the judge and jury knowing the state of mind of the man who gave that answer should estimate the value of his evidence and take it for what it was worth. That was a course entirely inconsistent with religious liberty. They were prejudicing such a man in a court of justice—a proceeding that was opposed to religious liberty and religious equality; and it was putting a man into a position which he ought not to be placed in, because the whole principle of that bill to which they had assented was that a man's religious views, because they chanced to conform to the opinions of the majority of the jury, ought not to giv any extra value or weight to his evidence. He was not now arguing whether that was sound, but he said it was the principle of the bill. The absence of ordinary religious belief, the nonconformity to the religious beliefs of the majority of the community, ought not to take away one jot or tittle from the value of the evidence a man gave. The principle carried out to its logical conclusion would be a justification for the practice of any kind of intolerance. He considered that the amendment entirely deprived this bill of all value.

Mr. Labouchere opposed Mr. Bradlaugh's clause, and supported one by Mr. Hunter, of Aberdeen, who used the words, "who shall declare that he entertains conscientious objections to the taking of an oath." Mr. Labouchere's reasoning was as follows: For many persons an oath had no binding effect whatever. He himself would as soon perjure himself as tell an untruth, and he should not speak the truth one atom more because he was put on his oath. He did not require any terrorisms as to what would happen in the next world to make him tell the truth. It was quite enough for him that it was wrong in itself not to speak the truth, and that if he did not he would be liable to seven years' penal servitude. He had no particular objection to taking an oath, though he regarded it as a relic of a defeated superstition, and absurd, since there could not be two measures of truth. The present oath was the successor to the old forms of libation, of swearing on the head of a flamen, and of the oath of the freebooter who swore by the three kings of Cologne. It was altogether absurd. An oath was either an invocation or an imprecation. If it was an invocation, it was a calling of God to witness. But God was omnipresent whether invoked or not. If it was an imprecation it was a calling down of punishment if the truth was not told. But punishment would follow whether it was imprecated or not. One could not contract oneself out of it, as if this was a matter of employers' liability. The lord advocate seemed to argue that he might tell as many untruths as he liked—though, of course, he would not—but that if he did he would hav a good answer on the day of judgment by asserting that he did not swear to these untruths.

Mr. Trevelyan objected because the question was whether a man was bound to make a declaration of his religious opinions before he was allowed to discharge his duty as a citizen. He thought not, and therefore should vote against Mr. Bradlaugh's amendment. Mr. G. W. Foote voices his opposition to the amendment in the Freethinker. He says:

"Mr. Bradlaugh does not seem to hav managed the Oaths bill with his usual skill. He has carried his amendment by a small majority, after opposing Dr. Hunter's, which was, to say the least of it, no more objectionable than his own. But this may not secure the third reading, for several who voted for Mr. Bradlaugh's amendment in order to whittle down the bill hav declared their intention to vote against the whole measure at the final stage. And the worst of it is that Mr. Bradlaugh carried his amendment, as a compromise to conciliate the superstitionists, in the face of the stern opposition of Radicals like Morley and Trevelyan, as well as Labouchere, and even Illingworth, who had backed the bill. It is a pity that the hostility of such men was not discovered before; or, if discovered, that it was not properly reckoned with. Mr. Bradlaugh takes a justifiable pride in associating his name with an Oaths bill, and it is natural that he should feel a parent's affection for his offspring; but we doubt the wisdom of his forcing it through the House in a maimed condition, and by the help of Tory votes, against the protest of all whose sentiments are worthiest of respect. Were it a case of 'now or never,' he would be quite right in carrying the bill in any shape that improved, in however slight a degree, the existing state of things. But there was really no such desperate hurry. Time is with the principle of the bill and all the irresistible forces of progress are making for its success. We are aware that Mr. Bradlaugh is a discreet as well as a courageous fighter, and we hav not overburdened him with gratuitous advice; but the bill is a public measure, the moment is critical, and Freethinkers are entitled to speak. It is rather unpleasant to find Mr. Bradlaugh censured by the Radical press and lauded by the Times; and, on the whole, we cannot help thinking that there has been a regrettable miscalculation of the state of feeling in the House of Commons with regard to the latest struggle for religious equality. Some kind of compromise is often necessary in practice; only a fool thinks of carrying his own principles everywhere and always; but a compromise which excites the indignation of the best men on your own side is difficult to justify. A statesman or leader must always reckon with his own party first."

To these objections Mr. Bradlaugh replies that the present bill is the best that he can do, and that he moved the amendment in accordance with an "undertaking to the House on the second reading." In supporting his own rather than Mr. Hunter's amendment he said that the courts had construed conscientious objections to mean religious objections, and therefore that the bill as amended by Mr. Hunter would not apply where a person had no religious belief. It would defeat the object of the bill to adopt a form of words which would prevent the measure applying to the cases of himself and of others who sought to obtain relief in this matter. There were five English statutes and one Irish in which the form of words to which he had referred were used, and the only way of getting out of the difficulty arising out of the honorable and learned member's amendment would be to expressly repeal all those acts. In these circumstances he thought it would be better that the amendment he had placed upon the paper should be adopted, and he felt reluctantly obliged to oppose Mr. Hunter's amendment. He would rather the bill had remained as originally introduced, but he was afraid the House would not then pass it. If the bill becomes law, as amended, its advantages are that "it permits persons without religion to affirm their allegiance either as members of Parliament, justices of the peace, solicitors, barristers, etc.; and (2) it for the first time enables persons whose religion makes them unwilling to take an oath, and who are not Quakers, Moravians, or Separatists, to make affirmation of allegiance under like circumstances. (3) It enables persons without religious belief to giv evidence in Scotland, where hitherto they were absolutely incompetent. (4) It enables jurors without religious belief to affirm in all parts of the United Kingdom; at present this is not legal. (5) It enacts that if an oath be once taken it shall not afterward be set aside on the ground that it was originally invalid because of the want of religious belief of the person swearing. (6) It repeals six acts which at present giv the judges or magistrates or coroners the right to inquire into the sincerity of the religious objection urged by the person desiring to affirm as a witness or juror. (7) It repeals two acts which—by imposing on the judge, magistrate, or coroner the duty of being satisfied that an oath had no binding effect on the conscience of a person without religion—often afforded excuse or opportunity for insult to an unbelieving witness. (8) It provides a simple form of affirmation for written declarations in lieu of affidavits."

To the opposition of the Freethinkers, as represented by Mr. Foote, Mr. Bradlaugh reminds them that the amendments were printed in the National Reformer; that they were submitted by him to the executiv of the National Secular Society; that the executiv, on motion of Mr. Foote, unanimously approved of Mr. Bradlaugh's course; that the executiv instructed him to oppose Mr. Hunter's amendment; that he explained his own amendment and invited criticism, and no voice of dissent was heard. And while not desiring to shelter himself behind the executiv, he is of the opinion that he has done the best for the cause and for progress, and can only hope that he may be fortunate enough to carry his bill into law, when all Freethinkers will be able to share with him the advantages it will secure.

From this distance, the question seems to resolve into the old conundrum of whether a half a loaf at present is better than a whole loaf by and by. Of this the practical workers and leaders of Freethought in England are the best judges. There can be no doubt that the amendment is a detriment to the bill, for the mere mention of the fact in court that a witness or party in interest is an Atheist will prejudice a Christian judge or jury against him. Judges and lawyers will comment upon it, and cases might easily be decided on that alone, and not upon their legal or equitable merits. Christians who glibly take the oath are not subject to such prejudice, and the right and permanent settlement of the oath question will never be accomplished until an Atheist is on an equality with the Christian, and all men, Atheist,

Christian, Jew, Moravian, Quaker, or what not, can perform all duties of citizenship without a suspicion of an inquiry into their private religious or social opinions.

But the bill is undoubtedly a step forward—there can be no two opinions upon that. Whether its passage now will not indefinitly postpone consideration of a truly equitable bill, and, therefore, put back for many years the desired solution which by not pressing the present bill might result within the next two or three years, is, as we said, a question of practical politics which perhaps Mr. Bradlaugh is as well qualified to answer as anyone. Mr. Foote's impatience with a compromise—"a bargain in which each party defrauds the other and himself"—is, however, natural. He is straight up and down for Freethought first, last, and all the time. Mr. Bradlaugh has many other irons in the fire, and is a reformer on various lines. But as he told Parliament, in the discussion on the amendment, he has no objections to having the fact that he has no religious belief brought out. Holding the views he does, he said, he never shrunk from accepting the consequences. Mr. Foote would undoubtedly say the same, and there can be no dispute as to the devotion to Freethought of either of our English friends. The dispute is simply over a question of policy, wherein both may be right and both may be wrong.

But Mr. Bradlaugh may do well to remember that Freethinkers alone supported him in his long struggle for legislativ honors; that without their zealous, unselfish aid not even his great ability would hav opened to him the doors of Parliament. Their wishes should be respected, and if this "bargain between a brazen falsehood and a timid truth" is going to defer for many years the complete legal habilitation of truth, it should not be consummated. It is better a thousand times to suffer and be strong, than to partially conquer and be forever weak.

Lambs of Christ in Virginia.

The Rev. F. M. Todd, of Manassas, Va., was arraigned before the presbytery of Washington, a year ago, on the following charge:

"That on the 12th of May, 1887, he was seen by one Robert Turner, a negro, in the woods, about two hundred yards from the road, with a lap-robe spread and lying down upon it, accompanied by a white woman, while his horse was tied to a tree."

The verdict rendered was equivalent to a disagreement, the majority voting to dismiss the case because the evidence of the principal witness was not sufficiently supported. After making the discovery, the negro hastened home. There he met a white man, and both returned to the spot where the scene occurred. They found tracks of a horse, a man, and a woman. The negro said he saw the woman running away on all-fours, and that he recognized Mr. Todd. Mr. Todd denied that he was there, and tried to prove an alibi. But in this he was not very successful, because he had to admit that he was near the spot at the time designated on his way home on horseback. It was also proved that a woman passed that way about that time in a wagon, and her face was veiled. The name of the woman was given in evidence, but was kindly suppressed by the reporters. Nor did she appear to prove an alibi on her part.

The case was appealed by the accused to the synod, and the result was an acquittal. The clergy always stand by each other, if they can.

And now a Catholic priest of Virginia has had to undergo a similar tribulation. The Rev. Father Quinn, pastor of St. Mary's church in Alexandria, was summoned before the mayor of that city on a charge of outraging the eleven-year-old daughter of William Pruitt. On the day before the trial a Post reporter called at the parsonage. He was met by Father O'Kane, who said: "Father Quinn has nothing to say about this matter, but I hav no doubt he will be able to prove his innocence at the trial to-morrow."

With this unsatisfactory information, the reporter drove to the house of the Pruitt family, two miles from the city, where Mrs. Pruitt told the following story:

"Father Quinn has been coming about here for some time. He claimed that the city was disagreeable, and that he desired to get into the country where he could breathe the fresh air. On each of his visits he paid considerable attention to the children, and particularly to my daughter Rose. He would giv the smaller children pennies and send them away to buy candy, and would keep Rose with him. Some one told me he was a priest, and when I accused him of being a clergyman he laughed and denied it emphatically. I did not believe, however, that there was any harm in him, and on last Thursday, when he came out here again, and asked the children to go to the river with him, I thought nothing of it and allowed them to go. When they returned I noticed there was something wrong with Rose, and questioned her about it. She refused to answer me and I thought her indisposition was only natural. The condition of her clothes, however, alarmed me, and the next day I spoke to my husband about it, and suggested that I should take her to a physician. He did not think, however, that there was anything wrong with the girl, and so the matter was postponed until Tuesday, when the child's condition alarmed me to such an extent that I took her to a doctor in Alexandria, and had him examin her. The physician told me at once that some one had evidently been tampering with her, and asked if I knew who it was. I questioned the child closely then, and she finally admitted that Father Quinn had outraged her. She said that on Thursday last, when they went to the river together, Father Quinn had sent the younger children away and then seized her. Frightened by his demeanor, she ran away from him, but he pursued her, and catching her threw her to the ground. He placed his hand on her mouth to prevent her making any outcries, and then accomplished his purpose."

At this point in the mother's story the girl herself was called, and in a bashful, hesitating way confirmed what her mother said. The reporter described the girl as pretty, not very well developed for her age, but strong, agil, and intelligent. She was too young to realize the importance of the charge against the priest, but was willing to aid in the prosecution; and yet she had only the most kindly feeling toward him.

On the trial before the mayor, June 21st, Father Quinn appeared to be less disturbed than was Father O'Kane. The accused priest is a large man, about thirty years of age, and has been pastor of St. Mary's church three years. The testimony of the girl was taken in writing while the other witnesses were removed from the room. She repeated the story as previously told to the reporter. On cross-examination she was confused on some points, but the lawyers were unable to cause her to swerve from the main features of her recital. The physician O'Brien, who had examined the girl after the alleged assault, was unable now to testify that he believed an assault had been committed. He thought the girl was diseased, but whether the disease was due to natural causes or not he was unable to determin. The mother gave her testimony; and two colored boys testified that they saw Father Quinn with the girl, but saw nothing improper.

This closed the case for the prosecution, and the counsel for the priest was about to call him to the stand, when the prosecuting attorney kindly interposed, and, after a brief conference with the mayor, announced that the commonwealth had failed to make good the charge, whereupon the mayor declared the case dismissed.

This was received with applause, and Father Quinn was heartily congratulated on the happy outcome of a matter that at first threatened to be decidedly serious. The explanation given of the affair by friends of Father Quinn is that, while he was asleep under a tree, he was rudely disturbed by the children. Angered by their conduct, he ran after them, and catching Rose, he proceeded to chastise her.

The foregoing account of the case is taken almost verbatim from the report in the Washington Post. It is quite evident that the priest is guilty. The pretense that he chastised the girl is too lame. The statement of the reporter who interviewed her before the trial is that, "while she is willing to aid in the prosecution, she has nevertheless only the most kindly feeling toward Father Quinn."

The result of the trial is what was to be expected. The "unblemished reputation" of the priest must be maintained at any cost. So Father Quinn remains pastor of the church of the Holy Virgin in Alexandria, and Parson Todd continues to administer the bread of life to his Presbyterian flock in Manassas.

Coarsely Profane.

Mr. Bowen's Independent, Congregational organ, was particularly kind to THE TRUTH SEEKER last week. In writing of Courtlandt Palmer's death, it says:

"Last week died the most activ apostle of unbelief in this city, Mr. Courtlandt Palmer. He was a man of education, culture, wealth, and leisure, and he devoted his life to the task of showing that Christianity is inferior to scientific unbelief as a body of doctrin and as a guide of life. Less offensiv and insulting toward Christianity than Mr. Ingersoll and the buzzards of the pictorial Infidel weekly, he yet gave them his abundant support."

Again, in another editorial:

"It may be worth while to print what THE TRUTH SEEKER, the organ of the most pronounced unbelievers in this city, and the most coarsely profane journal in the country, has to say of the late Mr. Courtlandt Palmer."

We are the more grateful for this exhibition of Christian courtesy as it was entirely unexpected. The Independent has often used THE TRUTH SEEKER as a text, but never before with such true Christian charity of tone and manner. The buzzards salute you, Messrs. Bowen and Ward.

Despoiling the Stranger.

Receiver Dyer, appointed under act of Congress to administer the affairs of the Mormons, has obtained possession of the following property:

Aggregate of certain sums	$157,666.15
Church farm	150,000.00
Coal lands	100,000.00
Sheep (30,000)	60,000.00
Cattle, etc	75,000.00
Gas stock	75,000,00
Salt Lake tithing-yard	50,000.00
Gardo House	50,000.00
Theater stock	27,000.00
Telegraph stock	22,000.00
Historian's office	20,000.00
Dividends on gas stock	4,000.00
Temple Square	.....
Grand total	$790,666.15

Temple Square, upon which no value is placed, covers ten acres in the heart of Salt Lake City, holding the Tabernacle, the City Assembly Hall, and the great granit Temple, with foundations sixteen feet thick and walls ninety feet high, which, though unfinished, has cost $2,500,000 to date.

We trust that when Receiver Dyer gets through confiscating the church property of the Mormons he will take hold of the church property of the Protestants and the Catholics. He has the same right to confiscate the property of one sect as of the other. But he won't do it.

And now that Congress has set the legislativ example, let us hope that the state governments will profit by it. Let all states confiscate all property in excess of $50,000 of all sects. Let's take the church farms and stock, steal the fruits of their garden, gather in their stocks and bonds and cash, and sell their real estate under the auctioneer's hammer. Probably a hundred millions could be realized in this way in this city and county alone, making the paltry three or four millions garnered in Salt Lake City look small!

Why not? If it is right in Utah it is right in New York. Precisely the same reasons exist for such confiscation, and shall the Christians who boast of their readiness to do and dare for principle shrink from doing the right because it would touch their own pockets?

A Veritable but Hitherto Unknown David.

We hav received the following postal card from Cincinnati:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: An answer from you to the following queries will be esteemed as a great favor: The Rev. Mr. Ganghorn gave a lecture on 'Christian Evidences,' in which he said that he had challenged all the Freethinkers of note, but owing to his great abilities as a debater and the 'powerful' arguments he uses they not only declined to meet him, but were 'all converted' to Christianity. He said this was the reason Colonel Ingersoll left the lecture field, and that the editor of the leading Freethought paper of New York was converted by him. Is this reliable? Yours truly, CHARLES MEYER."

We much fear the Rev. Mr. Ganghorn has been too closely reading the Bible, and become influenced in his historical style by that ancient volume. Fable and myth should not be too frequently employed in the pulpit, lest it become wearisome, and, peradventure, rebound to the confusion of the breaker of the bread of life.

THE Toronto Secular Thought reports that week before last, at Kingston, Ont., Mr. George Briggs was the defendant in a case brought before Police Magistrate McKim. It was decided upon the part of the prosecution that Mr. Briggs be sworn; accordingly the following colloquy ensued: Mr. Shaw, prosecuting attorney: "Do you believe in the Bible?" Defendant: "What Bible—that Bible?" Attorney: "Do you believe in God?" Defendant: "What God—the God mentioned in that Bible?" Attorney: "Yes." Defendant: "No, sir." Attorney: "Do you believe in the scriptures and revelations?" Defendant: "No." Attorney: "What do you believe in?" Defendant: "I believe in doing what is right and good." The magistrate refused to hear the evidence after such a declaration, and thereupon decided the case against Mr. Briggs. This, comments Mr. Watts, is a monstrous act of orthodox stupidity and injustice. The defendant was willing to speak the truth, but this, in orthodox estimation, is not sufficient; a silly and meaningless form must be gone through, in direct opposition to Christ's injunctions to the contrary. It is quite time that the right of affirmation was in force in Canada, as it is in England.

Letters from Friends.

SOUTH OTSELIO, N. Y., July 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is indispensable to our family, and has not lost a particle of its old interest since the untimely death of its dear Editor and founder. I am greatly interested in the pros and cons of Spiritualism. I am glad you are disposed to giv both sides a hearing. Spiritualism I regard as the grandest truth of this or any other age; nevertheless, controversy and criticism are in order, and eminently justifiable in regard to its varied manifestations. The crucible of reason is always essential in dealing with this grand subject. I am glad the splendid articles of John Peck are to be published in book form. MARY PECK.

DEL NORTE, COL., July 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $1.50 to keep paid up while I try a little longer to raise a club. I hav to contend with many difficulties, among which is a town on the decline in which are a mossback college, the fossilized indifference of the people, and the affliction of poverty which is upon us all. But being the last to giv up, I will succeed finally in introducing THE TRUTH SEEKER in this community.

What is the outlook for getting the cartoons in book form? Hav any steps been taken to that end, or could it be done if the necessary means could be provided? From their first appearance I hoped to see it done, and still hope to see them all saved up for that purpose. An annual compilation of them would be a grand thing for missionary work as well as to hand down to posterity. ETHAN ALLEN GATES.

CONAWAY CO., ARK., June 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper came according to time. The fact is, I sent for the paper for another man. I hav been a Liberal for several years. I hav a small stock of Liberal books, which I furnish the people to read. By the use of your paper and my books I made a warm church-member a stanch Freethinker. The minister told him if he did not hav his children baptized, they would go to hell. His answer was, that if that was the case he already had three there, and he wanted to go there too. He now says that preaching is a pack of foolishness. He also informed me that he wants to continue the paper and purchase some books. The Christians hate this, as he was their main singer in their big meetings. His name is A. W. Broadhurst.

I am very commonly called "Bob Ingersoll." I hav freely spoken my opinions before all classes of people. This has hurt me so badly that I can get credit by just merely asking for it, where the most of my Christian friends hav to giv a mortgage. I will say to my Liberal friends that they may not fear to express their honest opinions, if they do it in a quiet way. There are a great many Liberals in this country. A Presbyterian minister preached here a few Sundays ago, and his text was Infidelity. Of course, he said there was not a contradiction in the Bible. He said that an Infidel was not allowed his oath. I offered him $50 to prove it, so the next time he preached he said if he had hurt anybody's feelings he was sorry for it. I wish to show the common argument of the Christians in this country. They say that all law is founded on the Bible. You cannot prove yourself to be a man, or a horse, or a dog, without the Bible.

JASPER, TENN., July 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 14th F. M. Holland, in answer to Colonel Ingersoll on the tariff, says that "the 30 cents per pound on all imported woolens, whether fine or coarse, increases the price of the poor man's cloth, which costs 75 cents a yard, and weighing 28 ounces, pays a value duty of 26 1-4 cents, and also a special duty per weight of 61 cents, so that his tax is 87 1-4 cents, or 116 per cent." Now, this is all very nice on paper, but the solid facts are against the statements of Mr. Holland, as he could easily hav seen if he had paid attention to market reports of wool and woolen goods. In the first place, clean washed wool, clear of burrs, is quoted in this market at 28 cents per pound; unwashed, 16 to 18 cents per pound. In New York, domestic fleece, 20 to 36 cents; pulled, 18 to 38 cents; Texas, 13 to 21 cents. Now, if the tariff was taken off the farmer would, in order to make Mr. Holland's theory correct, hav to pay the consumer the difference between the home market and the 30 cents tariff per pound, in order to get him to take it off the farmer's hands. I can buy the very best grades of Kentucky or Tennessee jeans at from 25 to 30 cents per yard, and other all-wool American goods in proportion. And American goods of same grade of foreign makes are actually cheaper than the tariff as reported by Mr. Holland. It is not the tariff that is oppressing the laboring man. It is our national banking system and the bonded debt. Let Mr. Holland read "Labor and Capital," by Edward Kellogg, and he will find out what the trouble is.

Mr. Holland seems to deplore the fact that American manufacturers do not sell more goods to foreigners, and intimates that it is the tariff levied by the United States that is the cause of our not doing so. We are not aware of any export tariff on our home industries. And the fact of our manufacturing and selling goods cheaper than the tariff levied, precludes the idea that the tariff interferes with our export trade. There is some other reason besides the tariff that keeps the Yankee from competing in foreign markets. The same is true of iron and other American manufactured articles, except nickel and tin, which I do not use and do not know anything about. It may not be true of those for aught I know, seeing Mr. Holland has missed it so far on articles which hav come directly under my supervision. I refer to current prices paid to the retailers in this neck of the woods by the consumer. AMOS L. GRIFFITH.

ROCK ISLAND, July 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The editorial in the last TRUTH SEEKER on "Sunday" has expressed in it, in my opinion, all the words in the dictionary which could picture the Christian Sunday and the far-away dreams and hopes of waiting Liberals. As I write, my little daughter, ten years old, asks, "Mamma, what shall I do? Sunday is such a mean day! [She has been to Sunday-school, the only resort (?).] I think I will write a letter. How do you spell 'lonesome?'" is her first question. "Mamma" can fully sympathize with her. I am forty-two years old, and hav read for the first time this morning the book of Leviticus. It is tedious, disgusting reading, and I am convinced that those who hav not been brought up Christians, and those who hav, do not read it, and hence the indifference and ignorance concerning this holy book.

I hav spent the last year in the town of my birth, where I was raised a Freethinker. When I was eight years old, it was a daring thing for my father to take a Universalist paper; he dared a few years afterward to investigate and countenance the "philosophy of Spiritualism," and later to take THE TRUTH SEEKER. This is and always has been a so-called Christian town. It seems to me I hav always been under a ban. We hav been that honest in all our dealings with our neighbors that they are known to hold the opinion that if we only belonged to some church we would be the best of "Christians." Neither our money nor our intellectual standing, gaged by "society," is sufficient to giv us much social intercourse with our townspeople, and so this, the little world that I am forced to liv in, is a terribly lonely world, and Sunday, if anything, more miserable than all the other days of the week. Freethinkers, what are you going to do about it? Very truly, M. B. M.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., July 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: While we would not advocate the cloaking of a misdemeanor, it would seem advisable to avoid, as detrimental to the best interests of Freethought, all contributions which smack of personal enmity. Every friend of the cause must regret any manifestation of a personal nature. Individuals differ largely on minor points, and it is their privilege; but we can ill afford to sacrifice the great principles of Freethought to petty individualism.

Most persons are inclined to look upon anything which could be construed into a criticism of their methods as a personal indignity, which they must properly resent or be compromised, as instanced in the case of Dr. York at Salt Lake City. Absolute freedom of thought inconveniences no one. An unwise application of the principle of absolute freedom of expression might. "O consistency, thou art a jewel!" But the brain grows weary and the heart sad waiting, hoping, longing for the establishment of thy dominion on the earth. Inconsistency is a natural product of the human soil—an obnoxious, uncultivated principle; the natural enemy of Liberalism. But we do not despair. Nature has a mighty champion, and we know our efforts to eradicate errors are small tributaries emptying into the great sea of evolution, the wash of whose ceaseless tide upon the shores of time shall at last bear away upon its bosom all inconsistency. MRS. J. B. PUFFER.

BOULDER CREEK, COL., July 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Having now been a subscriber to your paper for a year, it givs me much pleasure to renew, and also to send the name of a friend as a new subscriber. Inclosed please find $5, to pay for us both for a year. I am glad to be on the roll as a member of THE TRUTH SEEKER family, and intend to remain there until the final debt is paid.

While I hav been an Infidel all my life, it was only through reading THE TRUTH SEEKER that I became interested in the literature of Infidelity and all the great principles you so ably advocate. I can but wonder at my former indifference. I was from the very first "entertaining an angel unawares." I begin to realize its beauties now. May you continue in your ennobling mission, until every Freethinker in the land is awakened to the intellectual grandeur of the religion of Freethought. It has been truly said that "mental pleasures never cloy," and what pleasure is there equal to a "feast of reason?" Reason is our guide, our star, our hope. It will forever lead us onward and upward. Cultivated as it should be, it will make every moment of every life a pleasure, and continually lead to new fields of happiness. No man or woman can be a Freethinker and not a reasoner, and the more they reason the more they are raised above the common level. No wonder the greatest and best intellectually in every age hav belonged to our ranks. Also the most intelligent in every community.

There are many things about THE TRUTH SEEKER I particularly admire. A grand feature is the food for thought which the most of its writings contain. Also the freedom it givs to every side of every question discussed in its columns. This makes it a truly Liberal journal, and furnishes its readers with a splendid school in which to train the mind to the impartial consideration of every phase of every question. This cannot fail to make broader minds and more intellectual men and women of all those who faithfully peruse its columns.

Another feature that I like is that you giv prominence to our leader, Colonel Ingersoll—what he says and what is said about him. I admire him more than any other living person, towering as he does above all others in the grand and fearless frankness of his honest utterances. He deserves to be better understood and appreciated by his fellow-countrymen. Happily, by his very force of character and surprising genius he is compelling recognition even from his enemies, and as he mingles more and more with his fellow-men he begins to be appreciated. It is a solid satisfaction to perceive that, in spite of his advanced ideas, he is already being accepted at his true worth by the good and true everywhere. As the leading educator of the common mind to a true conception of the "higher and holier faith" that is so slowly dawning on the world, he has still a grand mission before him. He has already done more than any other to rid the world of religious superstition, that cruel blight that still prevails. To popularize the movement of which he is the master mind and unquestioned leader, THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal journals cannot do better than to popularize the man. Let the world hear from him often what he is doing and what he is saying. Let the grand sayings, beautiful sentiments, and surpassing periods of his published writings be quoted often and often, until they become household words. They will awaken interest; interest will lead to research among his classical writings; and research there will lead to conviction as truly as the needle turns to the pole. Let Colonel Ingersoll be once understood and recognized as he deserves, and he will become a tremendous power for the advancement of the cause of Liberalism, if he is not such already.

I cannot close this letter without mentioning our own local Liberal journal, Freethought. The advent of Messrs. Putnam and Macdonald on this coast and the starting of this paper was a delightful surprise to the interested Freethinkers here, and the welcome thus far has been at the rate of two hundred new subscribers per month. I sincerely hope that our Liberal people will continue to rally until this undertaking is made an assured success. It deserves it, and we need such an exponent right here in our midst. There are many urgent reasons for this which I cannot elaborate. Organization, fellowship, the popularizing of our advanced ideas, everything socially and fraternally, urges us on to earnest work for the success of our home advocate, Freethought. It would be a grand thing for the Pacific coast Freethinkers to make their local exponent as much a power for good as is THE TRUTH SEEKER now. They can do it, and I believe they will. Hoping you may liv long to guide THE TRUTH SEEKER in the cause of justice, truth, and humanity, I remain,

Your earnest Infidel friend and brother,

W. S. RODGERS.

HALIFAX, N. S., July 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had another visit from Mr. Charles Watts, editor of Secular Thought. This is the third visit within a year, which shows that there are some Freethinkers among the Bluenoses of Nova Scotia.

We tried to get the clergy to meet him on the platform, but found them too wise for us to catch them that way. They contented themselvs by trying to prevent us getting a hall; by threatening Mr. Watts with arrest for blasphemy, and abusing him through their press. This kind of persecution only advertised us, and the result was we had full houses at each lecture.

The subjects were "Evolution and Special Creation" and "Ingersoll and Gladstone—Which Is Right?" The lecturer paid a high tribute to our champion, Colonel Ingersoll; also eulogized Mr. Gladstone as the greatest statesman of the day. Under the special creation, fall of man, and scheme of salvation headings he gave our orthodox friends some hard nuts to crack.

We intend having Mr. Watts deliver another course of lectures here this winter, and will hav him visit some of the towns in the western part of our province. We hav no organized society here. The course we adopt is for two or three of us to join together to run it. We each collect what we can from our Liberal friends, and pay the deficiency out of our own pockets. One of us takes charge of the business, engages the lecturer, hires the hall, attends to the advertising, silver collection at the door, etc. By this course we to some extent overcome the objection that some hav of letting the public know they are in sympathy with Freethought. My own opinion is that, if our reputation is all right every other way, the fact of our being known as Liberals or unbelievers will not injure us, but, on the contrary, many will respect us the more for being candid and honest in the expression of our opinions. Let the churches hav a monopoly of the cowards and hypocrits. Honest, outspoken Liberals hav nothing to fear or be ashamed of.

I send greeting to our brother, F. M. Borden, now somewhere in Colorado, knowing he will be pleased to hear that the stone he set rolling is still moving on, gathering strength as it goes. W. S. HUTCHESON.

COALTON, KY., July 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: If I was only able to giv the old orthodox ship one shot to help sink the old tattered and dangerous hull, I would freely do so. I would like to ask some of your Christian readers—I hav no doubt but you hav some—why Christ did not tell us of all the sins that men are liable to commit. There are many evils which the preachers tell us about now that Christ failed to tell us about when he was here; as, for instance, the use of tobacco, which the preachers tell us now is wrong. Christ did not say anything about it. He did not tell us that it was an ugly, injurious habit, and a slow poison. Why did he not tell us? Because, I suppose, he did not know there was such a weed in existence. He did not say that the opium habit was an abomination to the Lord, a grievous wrong, entailing injury to coming generations. He did not tell us that the use of morphine was a great crime when used to gratify a passion. These are only a few of the many sins which he did not tell us about.

If he was a God all-wise, he ought to hav told humanity how to arrange civil governments so that the greatest good could be derived to the greatest number of persons governed. But instead of that, he told us about a moral code and tried to giv us rules to liv by the following of which was to insure us an entrance into a government—a kingdom at that—where we will be subjects forever to one who wishes to be idolized and worshiped in the most foolish way. He left it to man to discover the power of steam and electricity, when one word from that all-wise could hav let it be known. It is said that he healed the sick, and raised the dead, and lovingly restored sight to the blind, and through sympathy shed tears at the grave of Lazarus. But now the appeals of the hungry are wasted in mid-air, and the blind must be fed by the charity of their fellows, and left to grope their way in darkness. And yet we are told that he is one and the same God yesterday, to-day, and forever. We are told that healing virtue went out of him when the woman stealthily touched his garments. If he was so easily affected by the association with suffering humanity, how is it that since he has arisen from the dead and is sitting at the right hand of his father in glory on high he turns a deaf ear to the cries of suffering humanity now? If he was so willing to convince a doubting Thomas, who had had every opportunity to inform himself, who had seen the wonderful miracles done—alleged to hav been done—why is it that he is so unwilling to inform an honest doubting Thomas of to-day who has never seen anything of the miraculous done in order to convince him? I used to hear the boys say, "It is a bad rule that will not work both ways."

There was a death on our creek, about six or seven miles from this place, the other day. The friends of the deceased sent for our sky-pilot to preach the funeral sermon. He said he would preach for $5; and got on his horse and went to the house of the deceased, and was promptly met at the door by one of the neighbors of the deceased, and asked if he had come to preach the sermon for $5. He said that he did not know that he would get the $5. Said the neighbor, "You shall not preach it for any sum." This is report, and I had it from pretty good sources. So much for preaching funeral sermons. If there is anything on earth that I hate to hear, it is one of these discourses where the pilot tries every word to touch the tenderest ties in the human heart in order to creep into favor and draw the friends into the church, and thereby extort money from them. I hav seen it done time and time again in my county. It is a very frequent thing in this country to hear ministers bring up deathbed scenes in their sermons in order to excite the weak and start what they call a revival.

The Liberals of this county would like to hav some good lecturer visit us, but we lack organized effort. I greatly appreciate your good paper and the work of Watson Heston.

Yours for U. M. L., SAMUEL P. HERRON, P.M.

HEPPNER, ORE, July 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Once more permit me to occupy a short space in the columns of your paper.

Some time ago Mr. H. J. Ward, of Coaling, Ala., asked me some questions to which I did not then reply because they were irrelevant to the subject under discussion. But after having felt called upon to defend myself, or rather my position, against Mr. Priestley's attack, it seems to me that a brief reply to Mr. Ward's questions would not be out of place.

He asks: "If she had never seen a copy of the New Testament would she ever infer from the Old that she would liv again? Would she not think that all the rewards and punishments were to be here?"

The doctrin of a future life is in the Old Testament as well as in the New, and it seems strange that anyone thoroughly acquainted with the teachings of the Bible would deny it. No satisfactory explanation, other than that the Old Testament writers believed in a life to come, can be given for such passages as these: "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness" (Ps. xvii, 15). "And after my skin, let them destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God" (Job xix, 26). "Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory" (Ps. lxxiii, 24). Gen. v, 24, certainly implies the recognition of a future life, as does also 2 Kings ii; 1 Kings xvii, 21-24; 2 Sam. xii, 23.

The fact that the Israelites made a practice of consulting such as were possessed of "familiar spirits" is sufficient to prove that they believed in the existence of the spirits with which they wished to converse. Saul certainly believed in the imperishability of the human soul when he visited the witch of Endor in order to communicate with Samuel (1 Sam. xxviii). Moreover, the doctrin of covenants contains in itself the supposition of immortality, for why should the eternal God of the universe make everlasting covenants with creatures of a day?

The true idea of future reward and punishment is clearly revealed in Dan. xii, 2, 3.

While I might cite numerous other passages bearing on the idea of a future life as revealed in the Old Testament (as for example, Isa. xxvi, 19; xxv, 8; Hos. xiii, 14; Ps. xvi, 10, 11), it seems to me that the answer which Christ gave to the doubting Sadducees of olden times has lost none of its force during the lapse of ages. He quoted a passage of scripture which the Sadducees had heard read hundreds of times, perhaps, "I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob." The next statement, "God is not the God of the dead but of the living," must hav been as startling to them as it was conclusiv, for it seems to hav silenced them effectually.

That the Old Scripture writers at times made use of language which, taken by itself, might cause one to think otherwise on this subject, I am willing to admit, but over and against this must ever be arrayed not only such passages as I hav already noticed, but many others as well, some of which, although containing nothing in them expressly declared about a future life, yet are utterly at variance with a Materialistic state of mind.

I hav read the chapter to which Mr. Ward would call my attention (Num. xxxi), and would like to know what his authority is for the statement that the Midianites were an "industrious and peaceable and virtuous nation?" We on the contrary might infer (Lev. xviii, 24, 25; xx, 23) that they were guilty of the most filthy and abominable practices, practices against which it was necessary to warn the Israelites lest they, too, be visited as were the people that dwelt in the land before them. I think that if Mr. Ward will search the scriptures carefully he will find that the sin which the Midianites committed, and also caused the Israelites to commit, must hav been a very grievous one, as it is mentioned in quite a number of places throughout the Bible. See marginal references.

In conclusion, permit me to say that I am well acquainted with that class of objections commonly brought to bear against the Bible, and it is useless to reproduce them for my benefit, as they will hav no effect upon me whatever.

MRS. H. A. RITCHEY.

HALSTEAD, KAN., July 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The churches of America are devoted to raising $1,000,000 yearly for "foreign missions;" and right faithfully do its servants work for that end. In towns where the people are chronically "hard up;" where there is no spare money for books, scientific lectures, rational amusements, and scarcely to buy food and clothing, the ministers will corral an audience, lock the doors, roll up their sleeves, and "raise" $400 or $500 in an hour. Families who must go without butter to their bread in consequence throw in their few dollars, without the faintest comprehension of the condition or necessities of those foreign heathen, or an inkling of their own slavish, church-and-state-robbed condition. Men who work for ninety cents a day, women who wash for a living, even children with a penny a month, "pity the heathen"—as though they could be much worse off—to the extent of all they hav, and feel happy over it.

Not long since I heard a good woman, a mother in Israel, pleading most eloquently for our suffering sisters in heathen lands. I do not know what she did with the injunction or command of St. Paul, "Let your women keep silence in the churches;" "Suffer not a woman to speak," etc. Anyhow, she did speak, even as one having authority. By a rare chance (it is rarely indeed that a poor, unbelieving plebeian is permitted to speak to a patrician believer), I was privileged to speak with her on the subject that seemed so near to her heart—the heathen.

With a boldness quite marvelous for one in my humble position, I said: "The millions of dollars you send to the heathen are stolen from the poor laborers of this country." She seemed quite shocked, but bore the infliction much better than I expected. She looked at me more in sorrow than in anger, as if she almost pitied me. "Hav you no sympathy," she said, "for the eighty millions of heathen women who are kept in harems, never allowed to walk or ride in freedom, but are always under surveillance?" I replied: "I don't know much about them, but I do feel sympathy for the millions of men, women, and children in our own land of boasted freedom and equal rights, whose lives never know the true joy and worth of living, who are strangers to warmth, comforts, and full stomachs, but are painfully familiar with hunger, cold, hard words, and hard work. We hav thousands of women in this Christian land who never walk or ride, save to and from their work, often carrying heavy bundles of cheap coarse fabrics, on which they work fourteen or fifteen hours a day, making cheap garments for cheap pay that barely suffices to keep the wolf from the door. Or in the mines, where mothers lay their wailing babes on the hard, cold ground, while the hands that should and would gladly caress and care for the little one are heaving the coal that helps to fill the coffers of some millionaire, whose generous donations to missionaries are heralded far and wide. And men whose lives know no rest or relief from their wretched homes and scarcely more wretched toil." She looked as if she regarded me as a rare specimen of the genus homo, and mildly said: "Oh, well, they must be foreigners. Americans would never submit to work like that. In this country, if any are poor and degraded, it is their own fault."

I did not say all I thought, as I did not like to endanger the possibility of a second interview. I hav learned that these brave "soldiers of the cross" do not return to the charge with alacrity unless they are treated very delicately, so I silently wondered why these same heathen foreigners are entitled to such tender sympathy and devotion that Christians deem it an honor to giv money and even lives to promote their present and eternal welfare, while they are many thousands of miles away. Is it such a crime to seek a home in our bounteous land that those who do so deserve to be treated as criminals and slaves? Is the soul of the heathen Chinee or the African Hottentot so much dearer to American Christians while in his nativ jungle than when he has found his way to the happy land which he imagined must be heaven, as it was the home of the missionaries who brought to him "the glad tidings of salvation?" How bitter must be his disappointment! But is it true that none but foreigners suffer injustice, cruelty, and wrong? Let the millions who toil early and late that a few may liv in luxury and idleness answer. Let little children who never know what childhood is answer. The answer must condemn our boasted civilization—our civil and religious institutions.

PROLETAIRE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., July 15, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I love to defend the truth from misrepresentation as well as to scatter its seeds on new ground. Our friend Mrs. H. A. Ritchey seems to hav read considerable of the writings of somebody who had a faculty of distorting science and then showing how absurd it is. Irrelevant and unfundamental phrases are selected as the only real and proper principles of evolution, and isolated laws of nature are mentioned, as though there were no others to help them. With her reply to Mr. Priestley I do not wish to meddle, but on the scientific part of her letter I desire to make a few remarks.

She says: "This nebula or gas-cloud, which evolutionists assert is eternal, could not burn if it were not a compound. . . . And compounds are not eternal." Now, here are two statements which I consider as false or misrepresentations. Although some may hav made such statements, I am sure that the majority of the foremost scientists of to-day do not believe or teach that this nebula or gas-cloud is eternal, nor do they to my knowledge talk of its burning. A thing may be hot to luminosity and not burn. Iron and many other things can be made so by pressure or by motion. I hav seen it done.

She seems to forget that "there is nothing without a cause," and that "action and reaction are equal and opposit," and hence that construction or combination and destruction or disintegration are necessarily equal; that nothing can be built till something is destroyed to build it of, whether it is a molecule, a crystal, a plant, an animal, a man, a world, or a solar system, and that while one is being destroyed the reaction must be building one somewhere else. As I hav read science I understand that evolution does not necessarily mean a "change from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous" always, but any change that is an advantage in the competition for life. A horse with one toe is very much better able to travel a mile in quick time than if he had three or more toes. The horse is an animal which has been produced by a life on a plain where one solid hoof is best, while the goat, ox, and reindeer liv and hav been kept with two toes by living on mountainous or hilly country where two toes are an advantage for safety in climbing. Again, sometimes under changed conditions an animal is advantaged by degeneration, or loss of size or limbs. (See Haeckel's "History of Creation.")

If all the known elements are eternal, she asks, "hav we then some fifty-seven eternal beings?" I think if she will read the latest books on chemistry and philosophy she will find that it is not claimed that the so-called elements may not be divisible down to even one or two really primary substances. Does she believe in the correlation of forces? If so, she knows that forces are convertible the one into the other. And also she ought to know, if she has read as much real science as she professes, that the ablest scientists not only are unable to define the distinctions between species but they practically assert that, although matter and force in their extremes are as unlike as possible, there is a blending where it is impossible to state which you hav under experiment. Also, that although chemical action and life in their extremes are diametrically opposed to each other, yet, like the positiv and negativ poles of a magnet, there is a half-way place where it is utterly impossible to define whether you are looking at chemical action or at a rudimentary manifestation of life. So there seems to be a great gap between a man and a moneron, but when we look at all the stages of development which lie between, the change from one form to the next is almost imperceptible—at least it is not greater than the greatest differences we observe in different individuals of the human race.

She says that "the law of inertia is a very important one," etc. "Every body continues in a state of rest, or of uniform motion in a straight line, unless acted on by some external force." Exactly, but did she ever see matter that was not acted on by some external force? When you throw a ball against the wall it comes to rest, inertia; but presto, change! reaction sets in, and the ball leaves the wall with the same force with which it struck.

She tells us that "every combination had a combiner," and every "regulated power proclaims a regulator." Yea, verily, and every destruction proclaims a destroyer, and every bungle proclaims a bungler. She simply means that everything has a cause. And, therefore, every cause had a previous cause, and there could hav never been a first cause. To create is to make from nothing, and as from nothing nothing can come, there never was a creator. Think of a first cause in total darkness, in a perfect vacuum, nothing to see, feel, smell, taste, sit on or stand on or to take hold of, or even to think about—think, I say, of such a nonentity creating something out of nothing.

Matter in some form must always hav existed, even if there is a God, for a God who was not composed of some substance would be nothing. Force always existed; for even if there is a creator, a creator without force could not move, think, speak, or do anything. And if matter and force always existed and their principles are sufficient to account for all known phenomena—and they are—where is the need of manufacturing an absurdity and naming it good or God? But as long as nature destroys as fast as she builds, she is not good or bad either. Each particular phenomenon in its effect upon our health and happiness is either good or bad, but not so with nature in general as one vast whole.

As evidence that spontaneous generation is possible, I submit the following facts. Natural forces and substances, namely, air, water, oxygen, nitrogen, carbon, heat, etc., support all the life we witness. The addition of one of these things is often sufficient to change into a living thing what would remain forever dead without it. Therefore, it depends on natural substances and forces for its existence. Subtract one of those and it disappears, just as subtracting one element of a chemical combination causes the disappearance of the particular phenomena it was manifesting. And therefore it seems probable that that which supports life was the original cause of life, and both are still in existence. Of course, life on this earth had a beginning and hence a cause, and will as surely hav an end when the reaction sets in strongly enough.

But I must close, recommending to careful perusal Haeckel's "History of Creation," two vols., preface by Prof. T. H. Huxley.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

How the Bear's Tail Came to Be Short.

A FABLE FROM THE GERMAN.

Bruin and Reynard met one day,
As cold a day as one could wish:
Bruin was faint; and, by the way,
Reynard had quite a string of fish.

"Friend," said the bear, "excuse my rudeness,
I am no beggar, it is true,
Though nearly starved; but hav the goodness
To tell me where such luck you drew."

"I angled for it," Reynard said;
"But how?" returned his famished brother;
"The ponds are frozen hard as lead."
"I know it," blandly spoke the other.

"But listen, while I make it clear
Just how by patience you can get
The jolliest meal you've had this year—
The best, indeed, you ever ate.

"Well, over yonder, in the ice,
There's a fresh hole—'tis one I made;
Go, slip your tail in, in a trice,
And sit right down—don't be afraid.

"The fish will find they've extra bait,
And bite and bite—don't mind the pain;
The longer you endure to wait,
The greater in the end your gain.

"At length, all ready, quick jump up,
Pull out your caudal with a jerk,
And, trust me, royally you'll sup,
And long remember this day's work."

Now Bruin hastened to comply
With Reynard's kind and wise suggestion;
He bade his friend a brief good-bye,
Nor stopped to ask another question.

Meekly he sat, and keener grew
The frosty air while thus he waited;
And fierce and strong the north wind blew,
But hunger craved a tail full-freighted.

The pale moon shivered in the east,
Shivered the stars in Charles's Wain;
He gathered up his bulk, poor beast!
And sprang up with all his might and main.

Alas! that day in bleak December!
My story's told—the hour grows late;
But nevermore his caudal member
Will luckless Bruin use for bait.

Biographical.

MICHAEL SERVETUS.

He was born in Spain, near Saragossa, in 1509. His real name in Spanish was Miguel Servedo. We can imagin that he was a thoughtful, studious boy, for he studied both law and medicin, as well as the Christian doctrins, and wrote and published books when only twenty-one years old. He had discovered the correct theory of the circulation of the blood before the celebrated Harvey and Hunter had announced their convictions on the subject. But he is principally noted for his doubts in regard to the leading points of popular Christianity. He did not believe that God was a three-headed monster, or that little children were born sinners any more than they were born saints—they were simply little children. His arguments were powerful and convincing, and because they were so, and unanswerable, too, he was regarded as a dangerous heretic. Then the Christian bigots, with John Calvin at their head, resolved that Servetus should not liv. And they thought, in their foolish ignorance, that it would be serving their God to persecute and destroy this man, for no other reason than that he differed from them in opinions.

Servetus had printed a book called, "The Restitution of Christianity," embodying Unitarian sentiments, and this called forth the ire of Calvin, and it was not long before he caused the author of the work to be arrested by the Catholic authorities at Vienna. There was a trial which ended in the condemnation of the good Servetus. However, he found a means of escape, and fled to Geneva.

Calvin was still watching for him and again he was arrested—for Calvin looked upon Servetus as a rival—thrust into prison, and denied the comforts of life. Nevertheless, he bore up bravely under very severe trials. Without being allowed the means to defend himself properly, weak, sick, exhausted by imprisonment and cruel treatment, one morning he was brought up before the court, and a council of sixty bigots, to hear his sentence.

It is just to say that there were among the sixty a number of fair-minded men who were averse to the death sentence of Servetus. The final discussion as to his fate lasted three days, but his enemies were in the majority, and voted to put him to death.

The method of his death was by burning. Think of it, a man to be burnt alive for his opinions' sake! How cruel! How dreadful!

When he learned what was to be his end, Servetus bent his head and wept, for life was sweet and dear to him, as it is to all. He soon recovered himself, however, and made final preparations for his awful doom.

He sent for Calvin to come and see him, and when he came he kindly and pleasantly spoke of their antagonistic relations, and humbly asked his forgivness for harsh terms used in the heat of controversy. But Calvin only sneered, and left the brave man without one kind word or look of pity.

Servetus was asked to recant and say that his teachings were wrong. But no, he was true to his honest convictions, and he would hold to them through all the tortures that might be heaped upon him, and his last words were a repetition of his firm belief.

So, in Geneva there, Oct. 27, 1553, he was chained to a stake and fagots piled around him. The flame circled and curled around the noble reformer, and thus, panting in agony and fiercest pain, he died.

But above the fire and smoke there arose, lighting the sky with new brilliancy, a wreath of golden and imperishable fame and glory.

It encircled his name, clothed it with that undying and fadeless beauty that great courage, invincible firmness, unswerving constancy, and loyalty to truth always bestow, and made immortal this martyr to religious intolerance—MICHAEL SERVETUS.

Correspondence.

KINZUA, PA., July 26, 1888.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: We do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I heard you had a fund started for a Freethought hero, and I want to lend a helping hand by adding my twenty cents for the benefit of Father Hacker.

I think the Liberal children quite slow in coming to the front in this good cause. Hurry up and send in your dimes, or we will not get this debt paid off before snow flies again. Maude must feel this lagging to be almost an insult to her worthy scheme. Yours truly,

WALLIE STEARNS MURRAY.

PAYSON, UTAH, July 18, 1888.

DEAR SUSAN WIXON: Becoming interested in the Children's Corner and seeing so many letters from other children, I ask leave to join the circle. In our town, which has two thousand inhabitants, most of the people are Mormons or Presbyterians, with the exception of a few Freethinkers.

Pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER about a year, and we all enjoy looking at it and studying out the pictures, which I think are very instructiv.

Payson has two churches—Latter Day Saints and Presbyterian; six schools—five district and one Presbyterian. I am afraid I will tire you. I will hope to see this in print.

Your Freethinking friend,

CORA A. CLARK.

"Boy Billy" and the Beer.

"Boy Billy" was the adopted son of Christian Zende, an honest German, who was much shocked one day at seeing the boy in a lager-beer saloon tossing off a foaming glass of beer. He bade the boy go home, but said nothing till evening. After tea, Zende seated himself at the table, and placed before him a variety of things. Billy looked on with curiosity.

"Come here, Billy," said Christian Zende. "Why were you in the beer-shop to-day? Why did you drink beer, my boy?"

"Oh—oh—because it's good," said Billy, boldly.

"No, Billy, it is not good to the mouth. I did never see so big faces as you did make. Billy, you think it will taste good by and by, and it looks like a man to drink, and so you drink. Now, Billy, if it is good, hav it. I will not hinder you from what is good and manly, but drink it at home; take your drink pure, Billy, and let me pay for it. Come, my boy. You like beer. Well, open your mouth. I hav all the beer stuff, pure from the shop. Come, open your mouth, and I will put it in."

Billy drew near, but kept his mouth close shut. Said Zende: "Don't make me mad, Billy. Open your mouth."

Thus exhorted, Billy opened his mouth, and Zende put a small bit of alum in it. Billy drew up his face. A bit of aloes followed. This was worse. Billy winced. The last morsel of red pepper from a knife-point now made Billy howl.

"What, not like beer?" said Zende. "Open your mouth." A knife dipped in oil of turpentine made Billy cry.

"Open your mouth; the beer is not half made yet."

And Billy's tongue got the least dusting of lime and potash and saleratus. Billy now cried loudly. Then came a grain of licorice, hop pollen, and saltpeter.

"Look, Billy! Here is some arsenic, and some strychnin which is used to kill rats."

"I shall die! Oh—Oh—Oh—do you want to kill me, Father Zende?"

"Kill him, just by a little beer, all good and pure! He tells me he likes beer and it is manly to drink it, and when I giv him some he cries I kill him. Here is water. There is much water in beer."

Billy drank the water eagerly. Zende went on.

"There is much alcohol in beer. Here, open your mouth;" and he dropped four drops of raw spirit carefully on his tongue. Billy went dancing about the room and then ran for more water.

"Come here; the beer is not done, Billy;" and seizing him, he put the cork of an ammonia bottle to his lips, then a drop of honey, a taste of sugar, a drop of molasses, a drop of gall. "There, Billy. Here is jalap, copperas, sulphuric acid, and nux vomica. Open your mouth."

"Oh, no, no!" said Billy. "Let me go. I hate beer. I'll never drink any more. I'll never go in that shop again. Oh, let me go! I can't eat those things. My mouth tastes awful now. Oh, take them away, Father Zende!"

"Take them away! Take away good beer when I hav paid for it! My boy, you drank them fast to-day."

"Oh, they make me sick," said Billy.

"A man drinks all these bad things mixed up in water. He gets red in the face; he gets big in the body; he gets shaky in his hands; he gets weak in his eyes; he gets mean in his manners."

Billy was satisfied on the beer question.—From the German.

Occupations of Great Men.

The Medical Age has been investigating this subject, and says that the father of Demosthenes was a blacksmith; of Euripides, a dealer in vegetables; of Socrates, a mediocre sculptor; of Epicurus, a shepherd; of Virgil, an innkeeper; Columbus was the son of a wool-carder; Shakspere, of a butcher; Luther, of a miner; Cromwell, of a brewer; Sixtus V., of a swineherd; Linnæus, of a poor country minister; Franklin, of a soapboiler; Rousseau, of a watchmaker, and Murat of an innkeeper. The writer concludes that the mothers of these men may hav been the source from which their genius was derived, and, indeed, it is known that some of them were women of more than ordinary excellence.

Manners Between Boys.

There is a good deal of rudeness between boys in their intercourse and bearing with one another that is not really intended as such, but it is not therefore any the less to be disapproved. It is simply the overflow of excessiv high spirits. But the very best humor, unrestrained by the proper bounds and limitations, may become the most positiv incivility.

We often apologize for the coarseness of people by saying, "He means well." It is well if we can make such an apology for them, for if their rudeness is intentional they are not fit to be received into any worthy person's society. But they who mean well should also do well, and the ways of politeness are never so easily learned as in youth.

GOOSES are the biggest birds knone to the human eye, and the he one is a gander. The gander is the monark of the air, but the rooster can lick him, cos the rooster he is brave like General Solmon, but the gander isn't fighty, more like preachers. The goose is a sailer, but not a wicked one, like Jack Brily, wich chews tobacko, and swears, and evry thing, and it has got lethers between its toes for to wolk the wotter like a thing of life. Ducks they are sailers to, but the swon has got a long neck like a giraft, and wen it has got a sore throte it is mighty sick. The little gooses is goslums and is green. My sister, she see a goslum and she ast Uncle Ned wot made it green, and he said, Uncle Ned did, that it was cos it wasn't ripe. Then Billy, he spoke up, and said wen it was ripe, it would be picked. And now I will tell you a story.—Johnny's Composition.

THE day had been overcast. Suddenly the sun shone out, and a little patch of sunlight brightened the corner of the carpet. At once Tray got up, and, with a wise look, trotted to the bright place and laid himself in it. "That's true philosophy," said George. "Only one little patch of sunlight in the place, and the sensible little dog walks out of the shadow, and rolls himself round in the brightness. Let not Tray's example be lost upon us; but, wherever there shall be one patch of sunlight, let us enjoy it."

SEVERAL years ago an effort was made to collect all the chimney-sweepers in the city of Dublin, for the purpose of education. With others came a little fellow who was asked if he knew his letters.

"Oh, yes, sir," was the reply.

"Do you read?"

"Oh, yes, sir."

"And what book did you learn from?"

"Oh, I never had a book in my life, sir."

"And who was your schoolmaster?"

"Oh, I never was at school."

Here was a singular case—a boy could read and spell without a book or master. But what was the fact? Why, another little sweep, a little older than himself, had taught him to read by showing him the letters over the shop-doors which they passed as they went through the city. His teacher, then, was another little sweep like himself, and his book the signboards on the houses. What may not be done by trying?

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Suow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Religious Problems,

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

The Absolution of the Bandit.

Spaghetti Penseroso da Sforzando Rimini
Was burdened with a lengthy list of crime and pedigree.
"How charmingly romantic!" will Matilda now declare,
Though at his table manners, O Matilda, you would stare.

A tender melancholy did his classic features shade,
And twenty-seven inches was his bright stiletto blade.
For yes, he was a bandit chief and with his lawless band,
Successfully he terrorized that far Italian land.

Though steeped in gore he yet possessed a sense of virtue strong,
That made him feel the life he led was very, very wrong.
And crime, no matter what you say, he could not well disguise
Was justly reprobated in the most indulgent eyes.

He never slipped his dagger in, and turned it round and round,
But that a feeling of regret within his heart he found.
It shocked him most intensely when his victim chanced to shriek.
His most atrocious murders made him ill for quite a week.

'Twas on a sunny afternoon that Signor Rimini
Encountered on a lonely road the bishop of the see.
It pleased him very much indeed, the holy man to meet;
He'd lain for him a dozen times upon that very beat.

"Stay, holy father! I entreat a simple boon," he cried,
"My ethical relations hav of late been sadly pied.
I'd like to ease my conscience up a little, don't you know,
And here's the ready cash. O rev'rend sir, is it a go?"

The bishop hemmed and hawed a bit, and then he hawed and hemmed,
But ready-money customers are not to be contemned.
So when the bandit mentioned terms he took them in a flash,
A scudo for an average sin, with twenty off for cash.

"Oh, sir" (for so respectfully the bandit chief began),
"You hav a heavy contract, for I'm a sinful man.
No crime in all the decalog but that my hand has stained."
"Good," quoth the bishop to himself, though looking deeply pained.

The bishop on the list of horrors kept a tally strict,
So with them, gentle reader, I will not your ears afflict.
The bishop smiled benignly as the lengthy schedule grew,
Indeed, he condescended e'en to cut a joke or too.

A score of trifles commonplace made up the list of crime,
And then the bishop figured up the bill in double time.
It came to twenty scudi odd. "I've nothing but a bill,"
The bandit said. "I'll change it," cried the bishop with a will.

He pulled an ample wallet out and counted down the tin,
Spaghetti strove to steel his heart, but Satan entered in.
"There's just one other little thing" (apologetic cough),
"And if you'll wait a moment I should like to get it off."

"To-day I robbed a bishop, in a gentlemanly way,
And anything that's proper, I am quite prepared to pay."
"Enough!" the bishop, scandalized, with angry voice exclaimed,
"You don't get off so lightly for the trifle that you've named.

"Your sacrilegious act demands a penalty condign,
And five-and-twenty lire is the very lowest fine
I should accept to call it square." "Oh, don't you hesitate,"
The bandit said, politely; "we will call it twenty-eight."

The bishop absolution gave and pocketed the pay,
"And now," remarked the bandit, in his light and blithesome way,
"I'll trouble you to hurry up and turn your pockets out!
For you're that very bishop we were talking all about."

Spaghetti Penseroso da Sforzando Rimini
Rode home upon the bishop's mule and caroled merrily.
The bishop travels little now, but still he could be fetched
A hundred miles at any time to see a bandit stretched.

The conscience fund, you understand, was left untouched and whole,
And so Spaghetti feels assured about his precious soul.
'Twas cheap enough, I think you'll say, his dolce far niente,
For only twenty scudi odd and lire eight-and twenty.

—W. G. van Tassel Sutphen in Time.

Some Matters and Things.

From the Chicago daily Times of July 23d inst. I cut the following:

A PRAYER ANSWERED.

Moody's Church Struck by Lightning in Response to a Request for Divine Manifestation.—. . . The man of God said, "Let us pray." He said: "O Lord! help us to a full understanding of thy great goodness and mercy. Giv us this day, this hour, some manifestation of thy power —" A blinding flash of light, accompanied by a crashing sound on the roof above as if a hundred panes of glass were shattered, interrupted the prayer. This noise was followed by a tremendous clap of thunder. The members of the vast congregation jumped wildly to their feet and cries of "fire" came from the outside. The church had been struck by lightning. Above the shrieks rose the clear voice of the pastor, calling: "Come back; do not disgrace the house of God. There is no danger; the Lord watches over us."

The thoughtful man, without fear, superstition, or stupidity, can see in the above another evidence of the "foolishness of prayer." It is barely possible that somewhere an event has transpired after a prayer which might appear to be an answer to an expressed wish of some pious individual, but it always so happens that the event is in the due course of nature's events—for instance, rain, sunshine, recovery from sickness, subsidence of storms, etc., and not in contravention of fixed laws. And yet there are thousands still clinging to a silly form, wholly without visible power or utility, daily pleading for unreasonable things that they never get by reason of supplication. Belief in the efficacy of prayer begets indolence. How true, "God helps those who help themselvs!" We use the term God to signify that great and unknown power that keeps the horolog in motion.

In the above case the response to the prayer was simply that nature was following her course. Is it not plain enough that if there was a special God, hearing and attending to individual cases, such things would surely never happen to his children? Read the above words of the man of God: "There is no danger; the Lord watches over us." How consoling to the weary Christian! While the Lord is watching lightning strikes. Fire ensues, and women and children are killed in the struggles of a panic; the ship goes down in the storm—yet sane men stand up and preach, "The Lord watches over us!"

On Sunday, July 22d, a few Catholic priests held a convocation in the Joliet penitentiary, to confirm forty-five convicts of Catholic parentage and inclination, although there is a regulation supernumerary called a chaplain, whose paid duty it is to prepare the convicts for sainthood. We quote from the Chicago Times words spoken by Bishop Spalding:

Being deprived of liberty and association with the world, even though for an extended period, was not as serious a condition as many believed. Real liberty belonged to the mind far more than to the body. Those he was addressing could strive to make their minds free and could enjoy the better part of genuin liberty. They were removed from many of the temptations of the world, and, in comparison with many in the world outside, enjoyed superior opportunities for turning their thoughts and aspirations to their spiritual interests.

How comforting to the criminal class! Commit crime, get into prison, and be "removed from many temptations of the world," and enjoy "superior opportunities" to become spiritual-minded! Now, doesn't this look like a lovely way to become a Christian? Read the bishop's words again. "In comparison with many in the world outside, enjoyed superior opportunities," etc. Get into the penitentiary in order to hav a chance to become better Christians! A premium on crime! How long will the sensible world continue to giv political and social place to dogmas so offensiv to reason?

JOHN BUSHEL.

That Badger Boy At Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF DEBORAH AND SISERA.

The teacher read chapter iv of Judges, containing the story of Deborah the prophetess and one Sisera, a fighting man opposed to the God of Moses, et al, that Badger boy toeing the scratch, as it were, at once for information.

"Was Deb. a tramp, mum, and had to tie up under a tree?"

"You James Badger, don't you dare to speak so of Deborah, a prophetess of the Lord!"

"No'm. Must a been ruff when it raned, mum. Did she hav a numbriller?"

"It's likely she had a tent, or a little house under the tree, you stupid."

"Yes'm. Was she a poor, lone woman, mum?"

"Didn't I read that she was the wife of Lapidoth, you stupid boy?"

"Yes'm. What'd he do, mum? Lap-the-broth—what a name!"

"James Badger, I'll send you home?"

"No'm—please. Deb. had more sand into her than the duffer 'twouldn't go to fite 'less she went with him, didn't she, mum?"

"If you mean she had more courage, you slangy little thing, then I say yes."

"Yes'm. Did she make the scads, profitin' for the Isrils, mum?"

"You needn't ask any such wicked questions, boy, for I won't answer you."

"No'm. That husband of her'n warn't no grate sugar, was he, mum, to let her go out fitin' with uther men. I'd a fit her myself, 'fI'd been him, and locked her up in the barn."

"You would, eh? Yes, no doubt of it. But you wasn't him—now shut up!"

"Yes'm. Did old Borax, the fiter she went out with, lick the uther gang 'cos she was with him? I s'pose he fit like thunder, to show off, didn't he, mum?"

"No matter what you suppose, you horrid boy; but he did conquer because the propheteess of the Lord was with him!"

"Yes'm. How do you know that was the reason, mum?"

"Because I do. Now you hush!"

"Yes'm. Do you believe they killed every one of Sizzler's men—knocked out every bludy one of 'em, mum?"

"Yes, I do! Doesn't the Bible say so? and isn't that enough?"

"Yes'm. How luvly your obbun hare is this mornin', mum! It's puttier hare'n Miss Higgles's is."

"Oh—now—James—now—don't——"

"No'm. That was ruff on Sizzler, the way the woman fooled him and got him into her tent, warn't it, mum?"

"You mean Sisera, dear. No, James, it served him just right, for he was ungodly!"

"Yes'm. She had offle sand into her to do that job, didn't she, mum?"

"God gave her the courage, James."

"Do you call that currige, mum? Seems to me as it was a mean bloody murder, drivin' a nale into a man's head when he's asleep in your house, and you ast him in!"

"Well, it wasn't, James, for the Lord sent an angel to say that she should be blessed above other women!"

"Yes'm. Wood you tell a man to come in, and cover him all up in bed, and then drive a nale into his head, and croak him when he's asleep, mum?"

"Yes—no—that is, if the Lord—if—er—well, she did it, and the Lord was pleased, so we must not condemn, James."

"No'm. And they had nales then, did they, mum?—and hammers, too?"

"It appears so, James."

"Yes'm. Wunder if 'twas a ten-p'n'y nale she driv into his head, mum?"

"I'm sure I don't know, James."

"No'm. Golly! I s'pose she jest giv it one crack and driv it way in, 'relse he'd a waked up, woodn't he, mum?"

"Oh, I don't know, James. It's awful to think of driving it in—don't talk any more about it, dear. It makes me shudder!"

"Yes'm. So't duz me, mum. But we mustn't shudder if the Lord liked it, must we, mum?"

"James, do, pray, stop, won't you?"

"Yes'm. What was that blessed woman's name, mum?"

"Her name was Jael, dear."

"Yes'm. Jail, eh? If I had her, I'd put her in jail for forty yeers, and drive forty nales into her head, mum! That's the way I'd bless her, mum!"

"Well, you havn't got her, and it doesn't matter what you would do. Now stop!"

"Yes'm. Who seen the angel that blessed her, mum?"

"James Badger, you stop this minute!"

"Yes'm. I guess it was a snide angel, mum, playin' roots on folks, so she woodn't be took up for murder!"

"James Badger, now you go home!"

"No'm, please. Duz God like them offle tricks, mum—drivin' nales into"——

"You awful Badger boy—now you go right straight home! The class is dismissed."

And thus ended the Deborah séance.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

MOSES AND MRS. MOSES (DID MOSES HAV A NEGRO WIFE?).

And Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses because of the Ethiopian woman whom he had married: for he had married an Ethiopian woman.—Num. xii, 1.

Odds and Ends.

A RUM go—Prohibition.

THE diary of an old maid is the record of a miss-spent life.

A THING that is lightly passed over just now is the fence surrounding a watermelon patch.

WHY should the spirit of mortal be proud? Because it is beyond the reach of prohibitory laws.

THE book-reviewer, unlike other literary men, can do his best work when in a critical condition.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher: "Why did the cock crow at Peter's denial?" Pupil: "'Cause it couldn't holler."

TOMMY: "Mamma, me and Maudie hav been playing doctor. I just giv her some medicin in a spoon, and she lies down and dies."

COMPASSIONATE housewife: "So you were in the army, my poor man. What was your capacity there?" Tramp: "Double rations, mum."

CUSTOMER (getting his hair cut): "D'dn't you snip off a piece of the ear then?" "Yes, sah, a small piece, but not 'nough to affect de hearin', sah."

"HOW'RE you getting along?" remarked one moth to another. "Oh, I manage to keep in clothing." And he disappeared within a fur-lined overcoat.

THIS is the time of the year that a woman packs her husband's coat, containing the book of tour tickets, in the bottom of the trunk that starts just ahead of them.

PROMPTER (to boy): "Tell Mr. Ham that his cue will be given very soon for the death scene. Is he ready?" Boy: "Yes, sir; he's jest got through eatin' a watermelon."

BROWN: "That's a handsome umbrella you've got there, Robinson." Robinson: "Yes." Brown: "About what does it cost to carry an umbrella like that?" Robinson: "Eternal vigilance."

THE negro is a warm-blooded creature; but he can stand right up in a chilling rain and eat his way right through the biggest watermelon in the patch, without the slightest indication of a tremor.

CLERK: "I pelieve ve vill get some pad vedders." Mose Schaumburg: "You believes ve vill get some pad vedders. Vat you means by ve? Since ven haf you been a partner oph mine dot you talks of ve?"

"AH, my friend," sighed a lugubrious stranger at Asbury Park, "there are skeletons in all families. I hav mine, and I s'pose you hav yours?" "Yes, sir," was the reply; "she is down there on the beach now."

"I HAV been reading so long, Mr. Sampson," she said, as he came up from the gate, "that my eyes are really very tired." "Lay aside your book, Miss Clara," he replied, with tender sympathy, "and let your tired eyes rest on me."

MRS. CHILSLEY: "I see statistics show that seventy-five per cent of male criminals are unmarried." Mr. Chilsley: "Which shows how many men prefer the penitentiary to matrimony." And the ensuing silence was so deep that Mrs. Chilsley could hear herself reflect.

CITIZEN (to Chinaman): "How are you going to vote, John?" Chinaman: "Me votee against Hallison." Citizen: "Why, how is that? Don't you know his record on the Chinese question?" Chinaman: "Yes. Too muchee Chinaman in countly now."

SHE: "What beautiful texture is Mrs. X.'s stockings; shouldn't think she would wear them in salt water." He (dreamily): "Yes, how beautifully shaped they are, ah—er—that is—er—the stockings, of course, you know." Runs behind a bath-house and kicks himself.

THEY were outside the garden wall. "Well," ejaculated Eve, who, woman-like, gave her alleged husband the greater share of the blame, "I hope you are satisfied now." "We ought to be, my dear," returned Adam, trying to be hilarious under distressing circumstances; "we've got the earth."

YOUNG imp (to returning Father of Evil): "Well, dad, what sort of a time did you hav on earth today?" F. of E.: "I'm only too glad to get home again. Tell Jimmy to put more coal in No. 37,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000, and make a roaring fire. I expect two New York politicians to-night."

"No, Mr. Smith," she said gently but firmly, "I can never be your wife." Then he struggled to his feet and said, in broken tones: "Are all my hopes to be thus dashed to pieces? Am I never to be known as the husband of the beautiful Mrs. Smith?" This was too much for the girl, and she succumbed.

"I WILL take," said the tramp to the bartender, "a little free whisky to be used in the arts." "What's that?" growled the drink-dispenser. "Ah," said the tramp, loftily, "you are probably a Democrat, and havn't the platform which we Republicans adopted. We there demand free whisky for the arts, and I will take a little just now to be used in painting my nose."

"MY dear," said a lady, who was sitting on her front stoop, "do you notice that poor man coming up the street?" "Yes," was the reply. "How I pity such people!" she went on, gently. "Their life must be hard indeed. Insufficient food and clothing, no money to buy even the simplest necessaries of——" Just then the wretched object of her compassion vociferated: "Pay cash, clo'!"

"JAMES," said the father of the family, sternly, "your school reports hav been anything but favorable this term. I suppose you failed in your examination as usual?" "No, sir," protested the boy. "I passed, but it was a tight squeeze." "Laura," continued the father, turning to his oldest daughter, "I think I heard voices in the hall late last evening. I hav told you repeatedly not to let that young man stay later than eleven o'clock." "It was just eleven when he left, father." "That's so," testified James, coming to the relief of his sister. "I was at the top of the stairway and saw him go. He got away at eleven o'clock, but it was a tight squ"—— "James!" shrieked Laura.

Gems of Thought.

To obtain the remission of his sins a Christian should feel a hearty sorrow for actions he possibly took great pleasure in committing. An act of contrition suffices to make one's peace with God, which is very convenient for Christians who, in spite of their contrition, hav no intention of mending their ways.—Voltaire.

DOES not the credit system in morals breed extravagance in sin?—Ingersoll.

APART from the irrational and immoral character of many of its dogmas, Christianity has exercised a baleful influence upon society by its assumption of infallibility, by its exclusivness, and its insane pretension that finality has been reached, that it is placed on such an immovable basis of truth that all science and all philosophy must take their cue from its crude and untenable creation story and its revolting and immoral redemption myth. It came upon the world when the world was comparativly a baby, and set itself to the task of not only seeing that the baby should not be allowed to grow any bigger, but that it should, if possible, be dwarfed and pinched back to something meaner and smaller. It pronounced an appalling curse upon him who should alter by one jot or one tittle anything in the jumbled incoherences of its scriptures. All knowledge was crystallized, all wisdom put into its eternal shape, eighteen hundred years ago. No secular book was of any use. If it taught what was not in the Bible, it taught what was unnecessary; if it taught anything opposed to the Bible, it was blasphemous.—Saladin.

MELANCHTHON, mild as he was, was not behind Luther in condemning Copernicus. In his treatis, "Initia Doctrinæ Physicæ," he says: "The eyes are witnesses that the heavens revolve in the space of twenty-four hours. But certain men, either from the love of novelty or to make a display of ingenuity, hav concluded that the earth moves; and they maintain that neither the eighth sphere nor the sun revolves. . . . Now, it is a want of honesty and decency to assert such notions publicly, and the example is pernicious. It is a part of a good mind to accept the truth as revealed by God, and to acquiesce in it." Melanchthon then cites passages from the Psalms and from Ecclesiastes which he declares assert positivly and clearly that the earth stands fast, and that the sun moves around it.—Andrew D. White.

FROM these ghosts our fathers received information. They were the schoolmasters of our ancestors. They were the scientists and philosophers, the geologists, legislators, astronomers, physicians, metaphysicians, and historians of the past. For ages these ghosts were supposed to be the only source of real knowledge. They inspired men to write books, and the books were considered sacred. If facts were found to be inconsistent with these books, so much the worse for the facts, and especially for their discoverers.—Ingersoll.

LEGISLATIV reform, the manful renunciation of entangling alliances with the ghosts of the past, is a sword that has more than once cut a Gordian knot of fatal complications. The suppression of monasteries saved four of our Spanish-American sister republics from a brood of vampires that had drained the life-blood of Spain for a series of centuries. In England the timely repeal of the corn-laws averted an explosion that might hav rent the coherence of the entire British empire. The abolition of slavery with one blow destroyed a hydra that had menaced the safety of the American Union by an endless series of political disputes. By the abolition of serfdom Czar Alexander elevated the Russian empire to the rank of a progressiv nation. The very possibility of national progress depends, indeed, on the hope of legislativ reform, for the rigor of unalterable laws prevents social development as the clasp of an iron ring prevents the growth of a tree.—Oswald's Bible of Nature.

HERE I may allude to persecution. This is entirely and exclusivly human, and is the most senseless and degrading of all feelings and actions. The man must be utterly insane, or debased, who can persecute his fellow for difference of opinion. Why do not our tyrants imprison and outlaw us for the shape of our noses, the color of our hair, or the size of our heads? It would not surprise me if they did. They hav done their worst in persecuting opinions; in this way they hav plunged to the very depths of madness, and we need not be surprised at any exhibitions they may yet make. In this the animals might well laugh man to scorn, and hold him in perpetual derision; for the persecutor is the very lowest type of being that crawls the earth—the very slime of slime; the last refuge of the world.—J. Symes.

FOR my own part, I would as soon be descended from that heroic little monkey who braved his dreaded enemy in order to save the life of his keeper, or from that old baboon who descending from the mountains carried away in triumph his young comrade from a crowd of astonished dogs, as from a savage who delights to torture his enemies, offers up bloody sacrifices, practices infanticide without remorse, treats his wives like slaves, knows no decency, and is haunted by the grossest superstitions.—Darwin.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 15. No. 33. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. { New York, Saturday, August 18, 1888. } 28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

IT is thought that in the next hundred years the population of the United States will equal the present population of Europe and perhaps that of China.

THE vicar at Barnaldswick, Yorkshire, discharged his sexton and attempted to run things all by himself. When a funeral procession reached the gates a short time afterward, it found them locked, while the bells were ringing for a wedding. The grave was dug too shallow and in a north and south position, and in attempting to lower the coffin the vicar and his boy let it fall with a crash to the bottom. He offered to dig a new grave, but the relativs concluded that he had done harm enough already.

THE faculty of the Ottawa normal school think that the fact that this year there were no honor students and not one qualified for the governor-general's medal, is due to rules permitting young men of the school to call upon young women of the school, and pass evenings with them. Until recently the rules to prevent the commingling of the sexes were of the strictest kind. They were not even allowed to recognize each other on the streets. If it appears that the relaxed rules are likely to result in too much calling and too little study, the old methods will again be employed.

AMONG the passengers by the steamer Rotterdam, which arrived at this port last week, was the Rev. J. V. Dundas, of Rice county, Minn., who declared that he had no dutiable articles in his baggage. Customs Officer Schaeffer, however, found in his trunk a fine white India crepe shawl, embroidered in silk; a large quantity of men's underwear, ladies' underwear, a silk umbrella, an aneroid, parcels of prayer-books, towels, handkerchiefs, perfumery, and in a false bottom five thousand cigars packed in boxes snugly fitting to the trunk. The trunk was seized. And now the Rev. Mr. Dundas will go home and preach sermons, telling his people that their duty is to be honest, law-abiding citizens. In the eye ofthe law Mr. Dundas is a criminal, but that makes no difference with his piety.

MISS MARTHA A. MCCONNELL was elected deacon, in the McKeesport, Pa., Reformed Presbyterian church, but the presbytery refused to ordain her, as there was no precedent for such action, and referred the matter to the synod. The synod turned the question over to the committee on disciplin, which has just reported in favor of ordaining women as deacons.

COSTA RICA has ratified a contract with the Nicaragua Canal Company, which apparently removes the last obstacle to the progress of this work. It remains only for the construction company to push along the excavations with zeal to hav the canal in operation before its Panama rival. The reports from Panama are not reassuring, and a collapse of the enterprise is prophesied, to take effect probably very soon.

THE Catholic University at Washington has already $700,000 in funds, with $100,000 more subscribed, 656 acres of property paid for, the divinity building ($175,000) ready to be paid for as the contracts call for payment, chapel and library provided for by a donor, and eight divinity chairs endowed.

THE story goes that a young curate once received from a lady an instantaneous photograph which represented the two parties in the act of kissing. The curate, while calling upon the young lady, had in a moment of enthusiasm kissed her, and she, artful belle, by previous arrangement had secured photographs of the scene, one of which she sent to the innocent pastor, as described, with the statement that she had eleven more, which he might hav for the modest sum of $100 each.

THE MOVEMENT OF THE CLERGY.

AUTHORITIES of Ocean county, N. J., hav unearthed an old Sunday law with a very severe penalty, and will stop the fishing on Barnegat bay.

A BERLIN correspondent of the Journal des Debats says that Bismarck is declining in health, and has repeatedly expressed a wish to retire to private life.

THE New York Times, in issue of July 15th, had a column editorial headed, "The School Tumult in Boston," in which it said: "There has been a strong feeling all over the country that the Roman communion is hostil to our institutions because its hierarchy favors the parochial school, which is the complement of the parish church in the Old World." It further said: "Boston is the first New England city that the Roman Catholics hav captured, and the attempt to formulate a Roman policy for schools indicates what is before the public school in other cities where it is possible for the Catholic to gain control."

THE Rev. J. B. Simmons, D.D., of this city, in an address before the Baptist Publication Society, said: "Beautiful as woman was when God created her, we cannot deny that, in morals and religion, she was a deplorable failure. From the day she turned her back upon God and God's word (both of which things she did without any influence from Adam), she became a heathen. Heathenism originated in her heart." From this it appears that the world is indebted to woman more than generally acknowledged, but it does not appear that woman is very greatly indebted to the Christian church for good opinions held.

THE story of how General Andrew Jackson got the name of Old Hickory is again going its rounds, and will be new to some readers. During the Creek war he had a bad cold, and his soldiers made for him a shelter of hickory bark. The next morning a tipsy soldier, not knowing who was under the bark, kicked it over. As the general, speechless with rage, struggled out of the ruin, the soldier yelled, "Hello, Old Hickory! Come out of your bark and take a drink!" When the soldiers saw Jackson shaking the bark from his uniform they gave three cheers for "Old Hickory," and the name stuck.

THERE hav been more Catholic churches, schools, convents, hospitals, and colleges erected in Tennessee, Alabama, and Arkansas during the past two years than during a decade prior to that time.

Communications.

God and the Bible.

EXODUS.

Chap. xxi, 7: "If a man sell his daughter to be a maid-servant," etc. These texts of scripture act as mirrors to reflect the state of society when God was paying particular attention to things of earth.

A knowledge of the times is all that is required to show that if God was conducting the affairs of men he was a very bad God. The more ignorant a man is the oftener he sees the hand of God.

To hear some of the war sermons during the Rebellion one would think God was fighting the battles instead of the "boys in blue." God always blesses the heaviest shower of well-directed bullets.

In old Bible times the people were very superstitious. They could see the footprints of God when a latter-day scientist could not find the mark of a toe nail. The fact that a man would sell his own daughters and steal the daughters of others and rob mothers of their babes, when all their customs go to show a state of society bordering on barbarism, makes the idea of God having anything to do with such a people as foolish as to believe that he would direct the affairs of a gang of robbers. God is having just as much to do with the affairs of men to-day as he ever did, and he will hav less and less to do as the people grow more intelligent.

Ex. xxxiii, 22, 23: "I will put thee in a cleft of the rock, and I will cover thee with my hand while I pass by. And I will take away my hand and thou shalt see my back parts." What a conception of God! A Fiji islander would be shamed by such an idea of God. Did his hand just cover Moses, or was there some left? The length of a man's hand is about one-ninth part of his hight. Allowing six feet to hav been the hight of Moses, then we hav 6x9=54 feet as the exact hight of God.

God chose old Noah above all the men on the earth to be saved when he drowned the world, and yet the first thing he did after he struck dry land was to get drunk and show his "back parts." One would think from his exhibition to Moses that God was on a spree too, for it seems more like the act of a drunken man than that of a sober God.

It is utterly impossible to do justice in ridiculing such ludicrous ideas of God. Suppose this silly part of the Bible had never been written, would the world hav suffered any loss? Has this Jehovahly nonsense had a tendency to lift men to a higher plane of civilization? Such a God is simply a creature of the imagination, and has no more to do with the affairs of men than a stone god.

LEVITICUS.

Chap. xii: I want every woman to read this chapter. Does motherhood render a woman unclean, or did some superstitious barbarian say so and then claim that the fiat came from God? No matter from what source the fiat originated, every mother ought to hold in abhorrence the one from whom it came.

Then she is to be unclean twice as long if she bear a "maid child" as she is if she bear a "male child." And, worse than all, she is to make an "atonement before the Lord" for the sin of having a child. Can the mumble over a lamb and a pigeon and a turtle-dove result in any good to anybody? Does such hogwash increase the happiness of God? If a mother can read this chapter and believe that it was written by the finger of God, she is lost to self-respect. This chapter simply shows the ignorance and superstition of the people among whom it originated. Would God command the race to "increase and multiply" and then put a curse upon motherhood? God had no more to do with this nonsensical bosh than he has with dancing an Irish reel.

I suppose every Liberal has read this portion of the sacred volume. But I want to extort a promise from everyone to read again the book of Leviticus carefully. I opened the Bible, and by chance my eye fell upon the passage in regard to the atonement of a woman who had a child. I felt that it was an outrage upon the race. I went carefully through Leviticus again, and that circumstance gave rise to this article. Does this portion of God's word show forth his glory? said I. If this is God's word, his throne, instead of being the center of pureness, is the fountain of filth. Was it given to man for his good?

The man who would read the book of Leviticus to his daughter and tell her that it is the word of God, would grow fat on the scum of a sewer. If a man should send a book equally indecent through the mail, would Anthony let up because the man claimed that it was written by God? Who does not feel degraded to think that such a scurvy production can be palmed off upon the people for the word of God? A devil in good standing would giv us something more wholesome. To teach the young that such nauseating ooze originated from a source of purity is to spatter with mud and then expect cleanliness.

Must the minds of the young, generation after generation, be infected by the poison from this upas? Think of it, O ye Liberals! I am writing about a book which the young are taught to regard as emanating from the author of their being, portions of which are so repulsiv that I dare not repeat them. And what I am afraid of is that some of my Liberal friends will think that I take delight in wading through this mire of superstition. But there is always more or less unpleasant work for reformers to do. If all could understand the degrading influence that a belief in this nonsensical drivel has over the minds of the people, they would join with me in lifting the public mind above this moral taint.

NUMBERS.

Chap. xii, 14: "And the Lord said unto Moses, If her father had spit in her face, should she not be ashamed seven days?" etc. Does this not sound more like the gibberish of an idiot than the word of a great God? If this passage were not found in the Bible, would anyone pay any regard to it? Ponder this verse and think of the Christians' claim that the Bible carries with it the evidence of a supernatural production, because it is far above anything man can produce. The Bible is like a boil or carbuncle—the only way to improve it is to reduce it. If the filth and brutality were expunged, it would be less cumbrous and more acceptable. Even then it would fall far below many other books which men hav written.

Chap. xv, 4: "And the Lord said unto Moses, take all the heads of the people and hang them up before the Lord against the sun, that the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned away from Israel."

In this verse there is something to be considered. Which is the more rational view, that God gave such a brutal command or that Moses or some other bloodthirsty wretch wanted to cut off a lot of human heads, and tried to make the people believe that God commanded the inhuman act? To a mind not entirely beclouded by superstition, the latter is the more rational view.

Again, is it more rational to believe that Moses or some other human monster was filled with "fierce anger" or that God was burning with "fierce anger?" Could the "fierce anger of the Lord" be "turned away" without his changing?

If it is true that God did command Moses to cut off the people's heads and "hang them up against the sun," he is the most cruel and ferocious God that ever sprung from the brain of a half-barbarous people.

Chap. xxxi, 17, 18: "Now, therefore, kill all the males among the little ones, and kill every woman who hath known man by lying with him. But all the women-children that hav not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselvs." There are thousands of Christians who never read these verses. Their minds hav been studiously turned away from them and many other similarly savage passages of scripture by their ecclesiastical trainers.

Now, I want to make a missionary of every Liberal, and this is the way I propose to do it—mark the passages as I hav directed, and as you find fitting occasions call the attention of Christians to them. Ask them to consider the unreasonableness of God giving utterance to such indecent language and giving such brutal commands. A few passages will make every Christian feel, if he hav a thimbleful of brains, as though he ought to take a purgativ. Verse 35: "And thirty and two thousand in all, of women that had not known man by lying with him."

Think of it! Thirty-two thousand young women to be kept alive for "yourselvs"—that is, handed over to the lustful embrace of the soldiery! Write this hideous command upon every gatepost along the wayside, that every Christian may see it. In all the books I ever read I never found anything more brutal and demoralizing. If we are justifiable in giving homage to a God who gave such a savage command, then we should take off our hats and make the lowest bow when we meet the lowest and most brutal savage.

After Probst had murdered a whole family he was asked why he killed the little children, and if it was possible that they had ever done anything to injure him. "Why, no;" he replied, "but when I got my hand in I rather liked it."

Probably Moses, who was on such familiar terms with the Lord, was about on a level with the man Probst. No doubt he enjoyed the killing of "all the males among the little ones," and probably was delighted when he saw "all the heads of the people hang up against the sun." But the horror of believing that such a ghastly sight would turn away the "fierce anger of the Lord" is enough to nauseate any but a Christian stomach. It is bad enough to be compelled to believe that human beings are savages. But to believe that God is a savage can hav no other result than to produce Christian savages.

DEUTERONOMY.

Chap. xx, 14: "But the women and the little ones, and the cattle and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof, shalt thou take unto thyself; and thou shalt eat the spoil of thine enemies which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

Could an untamed savage or even a devil do any worse? "Search the scriptures," and you will find some of the most diabolical acts recorded against God that were ever written down in any book. It is enough to bring a blush to the cheek of a Digger Indian. Every man who holds up the Bible as the word of God virtually indorses these barbaric acts, and would lead us back from the civilization and the humanizing influences of the nineteenth century to the corrupt and degraded condition of society in old Bible times. We read with horror of wild Indians scalping helpless children; but the Christian believes that God was actually helping such scalpers as old Moses and Joshua. The one who cannot see how such belief acts as an undercurrent to drag the people back to the crimes and superstitions of past ages has had his sight perverted by wearing theological spectacles.

Verse 16: "But of the cities of these people which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth."

Of all the acts of all the human monsters of which I ever read, nothing more atrocious has ever come to my knowledge. It is said that there are three persons in the godhead, but if God ever gave such a command, a fourth ought to be added—a South Sea Island man-eater.

Chap. xxi, 11: "And seest thou a beautiful woman among the captivs, and hast a desire unto her, that thou wouldst hav her for a wife," etc.

Would any but a sneaking savage hav a wife under such circumstances? A woman bemoaning the loss of parents, home, and country forced into the loathsome embrace of a savage by the command of God! Well, my Christian friend, how many lessons do you want before you learn that your God is the embodiment of brutality, or else that he never gave any such commands?

Verse 14: "And it shall be if thou hav no delight in her, thou shalt let her go whither she will," etc.

Everything is made to hinge on the desire or caprice of the man. The woman is supposed to hav no rights, no will, no choice. She is simply a thing in the hands of a man to be accepted, abandoned, neglected, turned off, bought, sold, used as a wife or concubine, raped, or rejected, as the whim may dictate.

This shows the condition of society when God was giving his special attention to the affairs of men.

It is to be hoped that he will not attempt to supervise our affairs for a long time to come, we get along so much better without him. Yet we hav seventy thousand salaried men in this country trying to impose these barbaric ideas upon the minds of the young, and trying to lead us back to the good old times when the "rigidly righteous" could hav as many fancy women around them as their depraved appetites might crave, and when a priest or other holy buccaneer could plunder his weaker neighbor, and all the people would shout, Amen.

Gorgeous temples are erected in which the people assemble to hav these ancient notions of virtue and morality impressed upon their minds, and to be taught how much higher David and Solomon and bloody old Joshua stood in the scale of humanity than people of the present day, and how much above the literature and scientific productions of the nineteenth century these sacred passages are.

In whole cities nothing is to be "saved alive that breatheth." And the seventy thousand are engaged to teach the young that this brutality is above the highest conceptions of humanity and justice at the present time. Not content with enforcing these primitiv notions of society two or three times a week, the seventy thousand insist that they shall be made a part of the exercises in school each day.

The whole of the twenty-second chapter is interesting as showing the condition of society when God was giving immediate directions to the people. Neither the thoughts nor the language are proper to be repeated in this article. Therefore, let it be read carefully for the purposes before mentioned.

In this chapter it is made to appear that if a man accuse his wife wrongfully, he is to pay the wife's father a hundred shekels of silver. The wronged woman gets nothing. But if the woman is guilty, she is to be stoned with stones that she die. The twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth verses of this chapter require particular attention. They are to the effect that if a man commit a rape on a "damsel" not betrothed, he shall pay her father fifty shekels of silver, and she shall be his wife; he may not put her away all his days.

In the name of all the decent gods, if there be any, I ask what a woman of culture and refinement would think of being the wife of a man "all his days" who had outraged her, with no means of escape. The father of the woman who has been debauched gets well paid, but the injured woman is left out of sight entirely. I expect Talmage will undertake to show in some future sermon that the idea of woman's rights had its rise under the old Mosaic dispensation. And then his sermon will be rehashed by all the pious dugongs in the country who pound Bibles for cold victuals, and all the anxious sisters will shout, Amen. Thanks for the doubting spirit of the age, we hav some women who do not sell out for the faint praise of men in white chokers!

Chap. xxiii, 1: Here it is declared (please read the verse) that if a man meet with a certain accident he cannot enter into the congregation of the Lord. If the best man who ever lived should meet with the misfortune mentioned in the above verse the day before he died, the gates of heaven would forever be closed against him, and hell will be his portion.

Naples, N. Y. JOHN PECK.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

That Fabricated Letter of John Wesley.

By ignorance is pride increased;
They most assume who know the least.

In the Sun of May 28th I undertook to prove that a recently discovered letter, purporting to hav been written June 14, 1775, by John Wesley, in defense of the American cause, is a fabrication. The editor of the Christian Advocate champions the integrity of the letter and says: "Mr. Burr is not well enough acquainted with Mr. Wesley's works to hav an intelligent opinion upon that subject." And again: "Mr. Burr's 'I pronounce it a fabrication,' simply pronounces himself ignorant of the facts, and brings him under the condemnation of that ancient proverb of Solomon: 'He that answereth a matter before he heareth it, it is folly and shame unto him.'"

The argument of the Christian Advocate in favor of the integrity of the letter is that between 1768 and 1775 Wesley changed his views on the question of American taxation, and, therefore, the editor says:

When he wrote the article referred to, "A Calm Address to Our American Colonists," which was an abridgment of Dr. Johnson's article, "Taxation No Tyranny," he was taunted with having suddenly changed his opinions, and with having at no remote period recommended a book entitled, "An Argument in Defense of the Exclusiv Right Claimed by the Colonies to Tax Themselvs." Wesley defended himself on the ground that he had changed his opinions to a considerable extent under the influence of Dr. Johnson's pamphlet. So that the letter which Mr. Burr pronounces a fabrication was in harmony with Wesley's views at the time of its date.

Not a word does the Christian Advocate venture to quote from Wesley's "Calm Address" to prove that its views were in harmony with the letter purporting to hav been written by him in the same year, 1775. I will therefore reproduce so much of the letter as the Christian Advocate quotes, and compare it with extracts from Wesley's "Calm Address."

But before doing this I call attention to the confused and blundering chronology of the Christian Advocate:

Moreover, Wesley modified his opinions again after the Declaration of Independence, and wrote a letter to Lord North and to the secretary of the colonies, Lord Dartmouth, to whom the letter now in question [dated June 14, 1775] was addressed, remonstrating against the war and pleading for America; and in that letter [of June 14, 1775] is the following passage published from Lord North's copy.

How is this? Did Wesley write two letters to Lord Dartmouth, one in 1775 and another "after the Declaration of Independence?" Or did he write to Lord North "after the Declaration of Independence" a letter exactly like the one written to Lord Dartmouth in 1775 (now first discovered), from which the following is an extract, as published in the Christian Advocate:

I cannot avoid thinking, if I think at all, that these, an oppressed people, asked for nothing more than their legal rights, and that in the most modest and inoffensiv manner that the nature of the thing would allow. But waiving this, waiving all considerations of right and wrong, I ask, Is it common sense to use force toward the Americans? My lord, whatever has been affirmed, these men will not be frightened, and it seems they will not be conquered so easily as was at first imagined. They will probably dispute every inch of ground, and, if they die, die sword in hand. Indeed, some of our valiant officers say, "Two thousand men will clear America of these rebels." No, not twenty thousand, be they rebels or not, nor perhaps treble that number. They are as strong men as you, they are as valiant as you, if not abundantly more valiant, for they are one and all enthusiasts —enthusiasts for liberty. They are calm, deliberate enthusiasts, and we know how this principle breathes into softer souls stern love of war, and thirst of vengeance, and contempt of death. We know men, animated with this spirit, will leap into a fire or rush into a cannon's mouth.

I now say that the sentiments of this letter are in direct opposition to those of John Wesley as expressed in his "Calm Address to Our American Colonies" in 1775. I first quote what he says in regard to the separation of the colonies from England:

But, my brethren, would this be any advantage to you? Can you hope for a more desirable form of government, either in England or America, than that which you now enjoy? After all the vehement cry for liberty, what more liberty can you hav? . . . What civil liberty can you desire which you are not already possessed of? . . . Would the being independent of England make you more free? Very far from it. It would hardly be possible for you to steer clear between Anarchy and tyranny. But suppose, after numberless dangers and misfortunes, you were to settle into one or more republics, would a republican government giv you more liberty, either religious or civil? By no means. No governments under heaven are so despotic as the republican; no subjects are governed in so arbitrary a manner as those of a commonwealth.

Again, compare the following passages with the supposititious letter, which alleges that the "oppressed people" of the colonies hav "asked nothing more than their legal rights:"

Vainly, therefore, do you complain of "unconstitutional exactions, violated rights, and mutilated charters." Nothing is exacted but according to the original constitution both of England and her colonies. Your rights are no more violated than mine, when we are both taxed by the supreme power; and your charters are no more mutilated than the charter of the city of London.

Ten times over in different words you "profess yourselvs to be contending for liberty." But it is a vain, empty profession, unless you mean by that threadbare word a liberty from obeying your rightful sovereign and keeping the fundamental laws of your country. And this undoubtedly it is which the confederated colonies are now doing.

If anything more is needed to prove that the letter of June 14, 1775, is a forgery, I will refer to other publications of John Wesley. For example, "A Calm Address to the Inhabitants of England," in 1777, and "A Compassionate Address to the Inhabitants of Ireland," in 1778. In the first of these he appeals to dissenters who hav "espoused the cause of those who are in open rebellion against their lawful sovereign," and says:

If you do not plead expressly for them, you at least extenuate their crime. Perhaps even scruple to call them rebels, and speak of them with tenderness rather than resentment.

And in the "Compassionate Address to the Inhabitants of Ireland" he givs them the following news from America:

In December General Washington had seventeen or eighteen thousand men in his army. From that time thirty or forty and sometimes fifty of them died in a day by a pestilential fever, and in two months' time upward of fifteen hundred deserted to General Howe, so that many were inclined to believe he had not now much more than five thousand effectiv men left.

In view of this hopeless condition of the rebels in America, Wesley says to the people of Ireland:

Comfort yourselvs, therefore, about General Washington's huge army that melted away like snow in harvest. The English forces meantime are in perfect health (about sixteen thousand), and hav plenty of all things.

The fact is, John Wesley was as bitter a foe to the American cause as Dr. Johnson. Hence these two Tories were the special objects of "Casca's" assaults in The Crisis, a weekly paper published in London from Jan. 21, 1775, until after the Declaration of Independence; and "Casca" was Thomas Paine. His first notice of Wesley's "Calm Address" was in the paper of Nov. 4, 1775, from which I quote the following couplet:

Hail, Wesley, hail! thy brass the prize secures;
Even Johnson's front's a bashful front to yours.

"Casca" calls Wesley an "ecclesiastical tool," and in answer to his question, "Am I or two millions of Englishmen made slaves because we are taxed without our consent?" says:

Tell me, then, thou shepherd of the elect, thou inspired teacher of that faithful remnant which shall be saved, thou great surviving limner of the tabernacle, if this is not slavery, what is the difference between slavery and freedom?

Had John Wesley been friendly to the American cause the fact would not hav escaped the notice of Thomas Paine. Indeed, he did giv Wesley due credit for his detestation of slavery. On that question Wesley and Paine were in perfect accord; but Wesley's "Calm Address" was severely reviewed by "Casca" in not less than four numbers of The Crisis of 1775–6. Let me quote one more passage:

Where is the man of reason and education (except the servil Wesley) who will expose himself to universal derision and contempt by denying this eternal truth: that governments are instituted not for the sake of the governors, but of the governed? But Mr. Wesley in his "Calm Address" (page 10) is not ashamed to assert the contrary. He has the ignorance and the impudence to tell us that our all—"our lives, our liberties, and our property—are, without our consent, at the absolute disposal of king and Parliament." Neither Mansfield nor Johnson ever ventured so far.

In view of such evidence as this, who now will dare to maintain the authenticity of the alleged letter of John Wesley, pleading for the "oppressed people" of the American colonies, and saying that they hav "asked for nothing more than their legal rights, and that in the most inoffensiv manner?"

The editor of the Christian Advocate has charged me with ignorance in regard to Wesley's political sentiments, and has quoted a proverb of Solomon as applicable to my case, imputing to me shame and folly. The wisdom of that much-married Old Testament saint is not to be doubted, and there is another of his proverbs which I particularly appreciate, namely, "Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou be like unto him." W. H. BURR.

The Worship of Truth.

While a student, the writer noted a remark by one of the college professors in the course of one of his lectures—he was a clergyman and pastor of that institution—which stands out in his memory, though it was thrown out in an incidental way, as possessing a very serious character.

It was, that there are some things of more consequence than truth.

He was speaking of religion.

Since that time, now thirty years ago, the writer has often asked himself the question: When a man says there is something more important to a building than its foundation, does he not mean that if he could only hav one of the two things he would let the foundation go?

To say that religion is more important than truth is to say that truth as a guide must be dropped when it leads us across the dead-line drawn by a dead past.

There is but one god—Truth; but one religion—to seek it with singleness of purpose and unswerving devotion.

Truth is the Infinit. Its behests include the whole duty, as it does the whole welfare of our race.

To be disloyal to the Infinit it is only necessary that the mind should cherish a rival purpose to that of knowing. The Infinit will brook no divided service.

If you seek the Divinity in all humility, in absolute candor, without one wish but to know and follow without reservation the command, the awe inspiring Presence will welcome you to the universal board where the beggar may feast beside the emperor.

But those who come to force the oracle, to rob the temple for their own purposes, or clothed in their own wisdom to demand a sign from heaven upon their selfish claims; those who bring their tomes and their authorities, decrees of popes and resolutions of synods, yes, or the keys of Peter, to unlock the mysteries; those who dare to personate and degrade to finiteness the Impersonal, setting up their sideshow gawds in place of the Unfathomable, and bar entrance to the Universal Presence with an icy barrier called faith; all these will find truth a dread Sinai, whose beetling crags will afford no doorway, as is given to the humble and faithful learner, but whose massiv boulders may at any moment reduce their presumptuous forms to powder which the mocking winds of the Cosmos will carry away.

Neither they nor their slaves can enter; for the fane unbuilt by hands is not for slaves.

The true worshiper must bear but one emblem—the emblem of inquiry, the badge of interrogation, the question-mark. And it must be worn in the inmost bosom alone.

He must also carry in his hand a white tablet, utterly blank; and let him look well to it that no scholastic dead hand, nor phantom of the past, nor human despot, nor fetich shadow, has left upon it a trace of invisible falsehood, to appear later upon it in semblance of the Divine word.

Whether you set up at the Eternal's door a vain idol called "Salvation," at whose feet you pause terrified by its finger warning you not to proceed within; or whether you desert the temple-guide, Reason, to follow the delusiv specter called Faith, you are from that moment a wanderer in darkness, an infidel, that is, faithless, recreant, a traitor; unfaithful and treasonable to the witness of immutable Truth.

Yet there are many such infidels, professing a two-headed religion. Truth they indeed profess to serve, but only when some finite idol, of the earth earthy, givs them permission.

The sun of Truth the idol givs them leave to serve is but a painted screen in some dark cavern called a church.

The temple of Truth is co-extensiv with the universe; and yet few there be that find it.

Why? Because they lack the honest question in the breast, and the pure white tablet in the hand on which the oracle can appear.

Everyone gets what he seeks. He who goes to the shrine with a lie in the heart and an insincere query on the lips gets what he seeks—delusion. He has his reward.

The worshiper of the True will often find strange and unfashionable songs rising within him; and find himself arrayed in colors not harmonizing with the servil crowd. But the songs will be the memnon-echoes from the arising Dawn; the music will be the voice of the Infinit translated into the speech that quickens humanity; the colors sun-born tints that do not fade.

Later on he will be in the fashion, when the generations discover—as they surely will—that Light is not merely negativ; that it is also warmth and life.

Then they will hail as their noblest friend the Spirit of Skepticism, the Spirit that inquires, tests, and imperiously demands a voucher from every creed; the Spirit of Doubt, that challenges every plausible, quibbling, sneaking, sanctified sample of mystery-mongering that in the name of some almighty emptiness seeks to enslave man; the Spirit that condemns to the limbo of impotence and contempt the orator or the writer who like a thief seeks to kill the vigilant watch-dog Freethought, before he tries to lay his cursed hand on the gem Freedom.

Doubt is a mere negation, is it? What can you giv us in the place of our religion, say they? What indeed? Everything. Release from darkness; liberty to grow and to move and to develop; from whence will inevitably spring, by the great forces that are in you, every positiv good, and all mastery over evil.

There are hosts of worshipers of the True, but they are scattered. There are few forums where they can exchange knowledge, gain the encouragement of intercommunion; few laboratories where they can work together in the absolutely unhampered search for the inestimable Treasure.

The press is everywhere subsidized by, or else in awe of, the enemies of the liberty of mind. When I meet with such a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER, whose Editor seems to care for what he professes to seek, as a paramount consideration; which is open to all views and on that one account, and not because of the side it takes in the discussion, is reviled and denounced by a discussion-dreading church, I then conclude that the little plant of literary freedom should be most carefully fostered and encouraged. Like a unique specimen of some rare plant whose leaves are for the healing of nations, this spark of smouldering vestal fire must not be allowed to go out; but taken in hand, literally, by everyone who longs for human enfranchisment with a longing that goes deeper than a passing whim.

So long as this organ follows its divine mission —divinely human—let every oppressed thinker subscribe to THE TRUTH SEEKER. BEDROCK.

A Down-Town Revival.

As I was walking up John street the other day after lunching at an old English chophouse on that thoroughfare which I particularly affect, I was aware of a church at my left hand, into and out of which streams of people were passing. I remembered that a revival was going forward in these parts, and as I had not for some years had it in my power to observe under favorable circumstances one of these phenomena, I determined to take advantage of the opportunity and entered.

The meeting was in full blast. I soon learned, however, that this was not the main revival meeting. That was to be held later on in the room above. I was witnessing only a sort of prolog, or preliminary canter, as it were. None of the principal proselytes were present, the meeting being led by a plain layman, who nevertheless turned out to be a fairish exhorter, I thought.

The room, which was in the basement of the church, was fairly well filled as to its benches. Behind stood a crowd of men, brought there evidently, as I was, by curiosity, who loitered for a few moments in this eddy and then betook themselvs to the street and to the affairs of life again. I joined myself to this kaleidoscopic throng.

A brother was praying—that is, he was, with shut eyelids and outstretched arms, indulging himself in, and treating his auditors to, that particular form of eloquence, half petition, half harang, which goes by the name of prayer. His manner was vehement, and grew more so as he drew to a close. He was egged on from time to time by excited groans and ejaculations from the other proselyters who occupied the benches. The purpose apparently was to communicate the exaggerated state of nervous feeling in which the revivalists were or seemed to be reveling to their hearers, so as thereby to mellow them for the harvest which is the object of the revival. This purpose was, however, but indifferently served. During the half-hour I tarried among them, the crowd at the door kept continually changing. Face succeeded face. On each countenance there was the same look of apathy slightly accentuated by curiosity. But I heard no offer on the part of anyone to accept the invitation that was constantly extended to come forward and be saved.

At length the kneeling revivalist concluded his address to the throne of grace. Then the regulator —if that is his proper title—called for remarks from those who were "witnesses," as he expressed it, "of the saving power of God's grace to sinners." These witnesses announced themselvs to hav been saved by the direct interposition of God either from the world, the flesh, or the devil, which being translated into the vernacular, meant, so far as I might judge from what I heard, the temptations to venality, concupiscence, and Infidelity respectivly. There seemed, however, to be a tacit understanding that the second class of witnesses should bear testimony in silence. Very little, either, was heard from the first class. So far as was manifest from this particular batch of witnesses, the saving grace of providence appeared to hav exerted very little influence over either the greeds or the lusts of men. The affiants were all, however, particularly strong on the subject of their rescue, by the express will of God, from the snares and machinations of the devil, which machinations appeared in almost every instance to hav taken the form of the lectures and writings of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

The first witness was an Englishman. He was a medium-sized, grayish, respectable-looking man, who talked with such a double-and-twisted English accent that I was able to follow very little of his discourse. He became intensely excited in the first twenty words. He sawed the air violently with his right arm and forefinger. He "tetered" upon his heels and toes after the manner of a Congressman from the wild and woolly West. He was, however, brief. This was a merit which he shared in common with the other witnesses. All of them were remarkable rather for strong than for long windedness.

The next man was an American of about forty, who looked as if he might be a clerk in some wholesale house. This man had been saved by the direct interposition of God from the sin of Infidelity, into which sin he had been led, as it appeared, by Colonel Ingersoll's fascinating discourses. He had been so saved at a time when he was upon the point of committing suicide. Generally, this gentleman's story reminded me of Mr. Dickens's robber, who, being upon the point of blowing his brains out, heard a cock crow and concluded to forego his intention—because he had once heard a cock crow in his childhood.

This man was less theatrical than the others. He told his story—which it seems he had told before, for it was recognized by the moderator—as though proving an account in court out of a ledger. There was an affectation of precision about him. He had withal the air of one who is telling a wonderful story and does not expect to be believed except after the severest cross-examination, which he is preparing himself for.

The witnesses follow each other in monotonous procession. All hav evidently told their stories before. All are aided by the rest with the same ejaculations and groans, uttered in various keys. But there seems to be no special zest in the proceedings. They are an old story to the brethren. And the sinners obstinately refuse to come in and be saved.

By and by an old gentleman with the hirsute makeup of a first old man in a third-class comedy company hops up in one corner and begins. But a rough Irish laborer has got up no less quickly on the other side.

"A moment, please, Brother ——," exclaims the moderator to the first old man. "We'll hear you after. This man arose first."

Whereupon the old gentleman subsides. The Irishman takes the floor, and is greeted all through his remarks with "Hallelujahs" and "Glory to Gods," not so much because of what he says as because he seems to be in need of encouragement. He has evidently spoken before. Of course he does not speak well. He is very hoarse and can hardly be heard. He is requested to speak louder. He raises his voice, and it then appears that he is of the opinion that those fastidious people who demur to revivals because of the nervous excitement with which they are attended are all wrong.

"Excitement is sometimes a very good thing," says the Irishman hoarsely, "and the excitement of religion is the swatest thing I iver tasted."

He invites his hearers to come and partake of it. Generally, he refers to religious exaltation as a species of tap of which he is particularly fond. His remarks are received with much approval by the brethren.

But the Irishman soon runs dry of speech. He becomes more hoarse, as if his subject had inspired him with a thirst. Directly he subsides into a seat in a dark corner.

"Now, Brother ——," exclaims the moderator, and the brethren turn expectantly to the comic old man, who promptly rises and begins.

He is a tall, thin old gentleman, who has evidently been there before. Indeed, he admits in the course of his remarks that he has been an exhorter for forty years. He is very blunt and straightforward in his speech.

"I once knew a man in England," he begins, "who, when he was a boy, his parents thought they were going to raise to be a gentleman, but when he grew up he insisted on being a banker."

This unexpected sally, which is evidently not at all intended by the old gentleman, is greeted with a burst of laughter all over the room. The old gentleman, not at all disconcerted, goes on to point the moral which adorns the tale of the English banker. Then he drifts off into some remarks about the duel between the French "primeer" and General "Bollinger," which he says was fought because one called the other a liar. The old gentleman's purpose is not at first evident.

"I was down on the docks preachin' the other day," he goes on, "when a rough man came up to me and said: 'You are a damned old liar, and you may go to hell.'"

The old gentleman makes this statement in a very loud tone of voice, swinging his long arm the while and "tetering" perceptibly. I myself am somewhat taken aback by the abruptness with which this coarse vulgarity of the docks is interjected into the calm religious exaltation of the prayer-meeting. But the brethren are evidently familiar with the style of the comic first old man, and he is greeted at this point with several encouraging "Hallelujahs."

"Do you think I invited that carnal-minded, rough man of sin to come off of the dock and fight a dooel with me, because he called me a liar, like the Frenchman did? No, sir. I just looked him right in the eye and I hollered at him just as I do now: 'You go to heaven!'"

The old man made the chandeliers ring with his voice. His arm swiftly sawed the air, once up, once down, and he "tetered" amazingly.

This sally brought down the house. It was decidedly the best thing I heard. It was the climax of the old gentleman's speech, too. For from this point he abruptly dropped the original style and took up the perfunctory exhortativ, if I may so describe it. But this fortunately soon glimmered into extinction, and the Nestor of the docks relapsed into silence and his seat.

He seemed to hav been the piece de resistance of this repast, too, for the proceedings now rapidly drew to a close. Directly the moderator announced the hour of adjournment, which he prefaced by an earnest little speech addressed pointedly to the throng about the door and in the hallway. He spoke to us collectivly as "You man," and he told us, with horrid significance in his tone if not in his words, that we had better get on the safe side while yet there was time.

He was a fat young man of forty, with a cleanshaven, smug face. He was very much in earnest, and, for this reason, impressiv.

"Remember, you man," he exclaimed, "when you go out of here what you hav heard and seen. Ponder and reflect upon it. These witnesses are telling the truth. They cannot all be mistaken. And think of this, O you man, when you retire to the privacy of your homes—think in the dim watches of the night of this: If we are right, how terribly wrong you are!"

With this Parthian shot he dismissed us. I wandered up Broadway with the arrow rankling in my bosom. Here was a plain threat of hell-fire and damnation hurled at all those of us who declined or were unable to go through the fit of psychologic seasickness which is otherwise termed getting religion. Here was the threat, I say, and yet hell and damnation had not been referred to once. Here, I thought to myself, is matter for comfort. The proselyter is getting more delicate in his methods. While he still thinks hell and means hell, he has the good taste not to say hell even once.

The world progresses. I remember, as a lad in a country college in Wisconsin, being moved, partly with awe and partly with disgust, and partly, too, with laughter, at the descriptions of hell they used to giv us at the weekly prayer-meetings. There was one little red-nosed professor with the head of a game-cock and the imagination of a Rider Haggard, who used to giv us vivid descriptions both of heaven and hell, which he, at least, enjoyed with evident gusto. Heaven, I remember, he invariably located in the northeast upper corner of the recitation-room in which the meetings were held, while hell as invariably occupied the southwest lower corner of the same room.

My recollection is that his description of heaven was rather a tame affair. But he came out strong on hell. My! how that little red-nosed bantam of a professor did revel in hell! I forget just now what he described the punishments to be, but I believe there was invariably something with boiling oil in them, à la Mikado. I used often to wonder in my childish way how he could be so sure that he had escaped all chance of going there himself. But he seemed to be sure of this, and his enjoyment was all for the sake of others.

Yes, the world has rolled forward a bit in the last twenty years. Though the saints still denounce eternal damnation against their dearest foes, the sinners, they do it more in a whisper nowadays. There is a great deal of absque hoc, too, in their fulminations. The man of wrath doesn't get hell-fire so bluntly in the face from the pulpit as he used to a few decades ago. Most divines nowadays hav a string attached to their sheols. The "if" grows greater as the world grows older and wiser. "There's much virtue in your if," quoth Touchstone.

I am reminded that there are some exceptions, however. Two years ago I spent the winter in Chicago. I lived at the Grand Pacific Hotel. Sunday evenings used to be very difficult to dispose of—I had few acquaintances, and the loneliest place on earth, I sometimes think, is the lobby of a big city hotel. On one of the most depressing Sunday evenings of the winter, I wandered out to seek diversion in the street. It was about half-past eight. I strolled down Clark street and directly passed a church, where services were going forward. I was lonely, and walked in. I wanted to be in the company of my fellow-men. I had some vague idea, too, that I should hear something of the gospel of peace and good will to men. Somehow, I wanted that evening to hear something about that gospel.

Well, I went in and took a seat. The minister was in the midst of his discourse. He was talking about the power and greatness of the church. Soon after I got there he began to speak of the attacks that had been made upon the church from time to time since the beginning. He told of the persecutions she had gone through aforetime when she was in her infancy, and he followed her history down through the ages. The moral of his story evidently was that an institution that had survived all these shocks and perils could not be successfully attacked.

By and by he got down to the present time, and began discussing the philosophers of the day. He was very bitter against these—much more so, it seemed to me, than he had been against the emperors Tiberius and Decius. He became very vehement. He was a large man, with a coarse mouth and a voice that somehow reminded me of lard. He struck me as being more remarkable for virility than for intellectuality. Directly his subject got away with him.

"I tell you, beloved," he exclaimed, and his voice was hoarse with passion, while at the same time he emphasized his words with an occasional pound on the cushion of the pulpit, "it is a comfort to me to know that the church of God in this world will go on gaining in strength and triumphing to the end, while these philosophers, these Freethinkers, these Agnostics, these Atheists, these Darwins, Huxleys, Tyndalls, Paines, these Ernest Renans, these Ingersolls, will be all smoking in hell!"

I got up, mad all over, and walked out of the church. But as I descended the steps the better thought came to me. The man, after all, is not to blame, I said to myself. It is the dreadful theology, which has paralyzed his better nature as well as most of his brain, that is alone hateful. He, in the language of the man he pretends to serve, knows not what he does. Oh, for the time when the world shall roll into clearer light, so that these men can see and know what it is they preach, what a ghastly abomination it is they seek to propagate!

And then, as I walked up Clark street to my hotel, a whimsical reflection came to my mind.

"What a comfort it is, after all," I thought, "to learn from such undoubted authority that smoking is allowed in hell!" FRANK H. HOWE.

Hell.

Those believers in a Christian hell who gloat over any kind of punishment as long as it is inflicted upon others than themselvs must hav derived vast gratification from the account of the recent hanging of one Morgan in Columbus, O. It was an atrocious refinement of cruelty worthy of old Jonathan Edwards himself. To such believers the reading of the account of this hanging must hav equaled in joyous effects the heavenly contemplation of the agonies of one's near relations in the flames of eternal torment. Ohio seems to hav been ashamed of the revolting spectacle, for it was enacted under cover of night. The poor wretch had been convicted, rightfully or wrongfully, of murder, and so the state of Ohio, not to be outdone in bestiality, proceeded to convict itself of another murder. He was brought out and the noose fastened to his neck. The platform was sprung, and he fell about seven feet without breaking his neck. His violent struggles loosened his hands, and clutching the rope above his head, he tried to free himself from its terrible grip. His gyrations and agonized cries as he swung to and fro would hav been a choice delight for old Jonathan Edwards. To add to the horror, he had torn the cap from his face, and the distortions of his countenance were terrible. Two so-called physicians, shame to say, seized his arms and held them while he writhed in the tortures of slow strangulation. Even the spectators, who were brutal enough to go voluntarily to witness such a scene, without protest, were appalled. Some fainted; others were taken sick.

Wishing to do something to express my abhorrence of this business, and desirous of aiding so far as in my power in abolishing hell from off the face of the earth, I wrote to Governor Foraker, the man who might hav prevented this atrocity, and a correspondence followed which I herewith submit to the criticism and judgment of the TRUTH SEEKER family.

ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

NEW YORK, Aug. 4, 1888.

HON. JOSEPH B. FORAKER, Governor of the State of Ohio, Dear Sir: Would it not be well, even at this late day, to institute some intelligent inquiry into the question whether "Blinkey Morgan," in whose recent official murder you hav taken such a prominent part, was or was not really guilty of the crime with which he was charged and for which he suffered? Very respectfully yours,

ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

COLUMBUS, Aug. 6, 1888.

E. W. CHAMBERLAIN, ESQ., 120 Broadway, New York City, Sir: What are you charged with?

Respectfully, etc., J. B. FORAKER.

NEW YORK, Aug. 11, 1888.

HON. J. B. FORAKER, Governor of the State of Ohio, Dear Sir: Your courteous and esteemed favor of August 6th is received, and, although it wanders wide of the question I raised, seems to require a response, at least as considerate and thoughtful as is the answer it makes to the suggestion contained in my letter of 4th inst.

The tone of your letter leads me to suspect that there is at least one person in Ohio possessed of the fallacious notion that a charge of crime is tantamount to a fair conviction. When that fallacy intrudes in capital cases a danger arises which seriously threatens the whole community. If your letter is a fair sample of the methods of thought of those who administer and execute justice in Ohio, it seems to me more than ever proper that my suggestion of an intelligent investigation in the case of Morgan should be acted upon.

The official murder of Morgan neither proves nor tends in the most remote way to prove that he was guilty. The atrocity of it does go far toward furnishing fair grounds for the presumption that the same wanton, brutal lack of respect for human life which complacently looked upon the consequences of conviction otherwise pervaded his trial. It invested him with a dignity superior to that of the court which compassed his death, and gave credit to his final protestation of innocence. Force is not argument. Two wrongs never yet made one right. There seems to hav been on the part of those who charged Morgan with murder a very strong inducement for convicting somebody. Is it not possible that in his case the charge too largely contributed to the conviction?

With no reproaches for the fresh murders that will probably ensue from the example set by the killing of this man, let me ask, Is it not time that measures be taken to prevent the recurrence of such scenes as that enacted in your state on August 3d, and is it not worth your while to inaugurate and prosecute such measures?

Very respectfully yours, ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

Bible Miracles and Evolution.

Some of the Bible miracles are great conceptions, such as the creation of the world at the command of Jahveh, and the production of organic beings; but others are infinitly small, such as the story of Jonah's wailing for three days and three nights in the stomach of a big fish; others are stupid. Some are serious but horrible. Some would hav been useful if true, while many are unworthy of a clever prestidigitator. It is now generally admitted that there is a perceptible evolution in the ideas of the Bible writers as to what a real miracle ought to be. And ultimately even miracles hav to be brought to the touchstone of common sense and utility. But let us glance for a while at the miracles of the Bible and see what they are.

The writer of the third chapter of Genesis, for example, thought there was nothing very remarkable in a "subtil" animal like the serpent carrying on a conversation with a lady, though the writer does not say who gave the serpent an introduction to Eve, or whether he opened the conversation in the customary way of "Good evening, madam. Fine day, is it not?" or in what language or dialect he spoke. After the "creation" the first miracle recorded is the deluge; and this, whether considered as local or universal, was a big affair.

Now, the miracle of the flood has always appeared to me in the light of one of the most atrocious of human conceptions. But if it were not a human idea, but an awful reality, wrought by an infinitly wise and good deity, then it was all the more infamous—indeed, inexpressibly horrible alike in conception and execution.

The supposed reason for the deluge was to clear the earth of all the wicked people upon it. The flood did more than this. It destroyed helpless and innocent children as well as inoffensiv and guiltless animals. And when this was done the end for which the flood was designed was not accomplished. Noah and his family, with the germs of inherent depravity within them, remained alive to transmit to their offspring the many bad as well as the few good qualities of their nature.

Is it not incredible that a good God would adopt such a method to remove evil-doers from the earth? If he were all-powerful he could, had he chosen, hav removed the evil from the people without destroying them, and if his goodness had been equal to his power—that is, had he been infinitly good as well as infinitly powerful—he would hav been impelled by his very nature to do it.

Moreover, was he not to blame, in the first instance, for allowing evil to enter into the world. Or, at all events, having allowed it, might he not hav nipped it in the bud, without permitting it to increase in such a fashion as to necessitate the destruction of all living beings, except one favored family?

But when we look at the idea of the flood as a human conception, we see at once what absurd ideas this biblical writer had of nature and of man.

Wickedness was regarded by them as an entity that could only be annihilated with the destruction of the creature. It had no reference to the kind of organization, the instruction, or to the environment of the individual. Not at all. These things did not count. The human heart was black, foul, and corrupt, and men's thoughts were "evil continually;" and the only conceivable remedy, to the mind of the writer, was the miraculous cold-water process by which human beings were to be ruthlessly sacrificed.

It does not appear to hav occurred to the writer that God might hav effected his purpose just as well, nay, better, had he performed a good miracle instead of a bad one, and converted the wicked people into good, wise, and just men and women.

No. Jahveh must do something appalling in its far-reaching consequences to demonstrate his power, else the biblical scribes were not satisfied.

The miracles said to hav been wrought by Moses and Aaron in Egypt are of a different order. They were performed like the tricks of the conjurer, and for no more moral purpose than to demonstrate to the incredulous and hard-hearted Pharaoh the wonderful power of Jahveh. Such alleged miracles as the sun and moon standing still, pillars of fire and pillars of cloud moving in front of the Israelites, the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah, may hav only been highly colored descriptions of phenomena which the writers believed to hav taken place, and are not, therefore, to be critically considered in the light of supernatural events.

Samson's single-handed encounter with a thousand Philistines we are now told by the learned revisers of the Bible to regard as "poetry." Samson's invincible jawbone was merely a poetical one—and we are free to confess that, considered in that light, the story is not without its lessons.

But how this poetic interpretation will help us to understand how Samson rent a lion "as he would hav rent a kid," I still fail to see.

Passing by the books of Samuel as containing nothing of a strikingly miraculous character, I come next to such miracles as the ascension of Elijah to heaven, as recorded in Kings, and the raising of the Shunamite's son to life by Elisha.

Now, the first of these miracles implies that God suspended the law of gravitation, and allowed Elijah to make a rapid ascent to heaven.

When it is remembered that the writer of the book of Kings had no idea of the immortality of the soul, one can understand his ardent desire to convey to his readers that a good man like Elijah did not die like ordinary mortals. This may hav been the reason that induced him to write an account of Elijah's ascent by means of a "fiery chariot," with "horses of fire," into heaven. Heaven, to the writer, appeared to be located just above the clouds.

Nobody to-day would seriously argue that God suspended, or, rather, violated all the laws of nature in order to allow Elijah or any other man to take an excursion to heaven, not only because we hav no evidence that a human being could liv there if he safely arrived, but because the study of astronomy has placed any possible heaven in the skies at such an enormous distance from the earth that Elijah and his fiery chariot would probably not hav reached their destination yet.

It is doubtful whether Elisha's alleged miracle of raising the Shunamite's son was a real miracle after all. At all events, he adopted perfectly natural means to bring about the desired effect. He did not call the child by name and say, "Arise! you that are dead—awake!" No. "He lay upon the child, and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands; and stretched himself upon the child, and the flesh of the child waxed warm; then he returned, and walked in the house to and fro, and went up, and the child sneezed seven times, and opened his eyes" (2 Kings iv, 34, 35).

A quack doctor might hav gone through the same performance with the same result, if the child were not really dead, but only in a state of suspended animation.

But if the child were actually dead if the vital spark had gone out of the body, then it is difficult to understand how breathing into the dead child's mouth would hav been anything more than a disgusting farce.

In both of these cases the miracles were supposed to be accomplished for a good end, and, unlike those in the earlier books, did not bring wholesale destruction in their train. The miracles recorded in the book of Daniel and again in Jonah are of a pueril character, wrought for the sole purpose of showing that the God of Daniel and the God of Jonah was a mighty being whose wonderful performances should inspire fear even if he could not command respect.

In the Pentateuch, then, we hav a record of miracles of a wholly useless, and in many cases of a very destructiv, character. But in the later books—we do not, of course, include the book of Job or other admittedly more ancient productions than the Pentateuch—the character of the miracles undergoes a slight change, until we find that in almost every case the object for which the miracles were supposed to hav been wrought, though the method was dubious, was decidedly good. Turn now to the miracles of the New Testament, and without inquiring too critically as to their credibility, let us see what was their value when tested by their utility. Take first the miracles of Jesus. What were they? Let us see.

Resolutions of Respect.

At a meeting of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, the following resolutions concerning the death of the late Courtlandt Palmer were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, We learn with deep and profound grief of the death of our friend and sympathizer the late Courtlandt Palmer, who, with his presence and eloquence, so often graced our platform in the past, and who, had his life been spared, would hav opened our meetings the coming season with the delivery of his latest lecture, "Human Mastership," a man who, unlike the sons of aristocracy, born to wealth and position, was not content with an idle and frivolous life, but sought the higher and broader fields of usefulness in an endeavor to benefit his race and make the world better; who, with the true instincts of a gentleman, used his voice and pen to level class and caste distinctions and pave the way for the future brotherhood of man; and who, a foe to all shams and superstition, recognized cause and effect to be indissolubly linked in the history of mankind as in the works of nature, and while deploring the misery and superstitious ignorance of his time, knew that such was the legitimate outcome of preceding circumstances and so—with charity for all, and malice toward none—bravely combated the wrongs of his age and sought truth in the great ocean of the universe with the rudder of experience for his guide;

Resolved, That by the death of the late Courtlandt Palmer America has lost one of her noblest sons; Freethought and human advancement a fearless advocate; and the army of progress one of its recognized leaders; and be it further

Resolved, That the Brooklyn Philosophical Association hereby tenders his bereaved wife and family its sincere condolence and sympathy in this their hour of sorrow.

Society and Its Criminals.

From the World.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll was greatly interested securing for Chiara Cignarale a commutation of the death sentence to imprisonment for life. In view of the fact that the great Agnostic has made a close study of capital punishment, a reporter for the World called upon him a day or two ago for an interview touching modern reformatory measures and the punishment of criminals. Speaking generally on the subject Colonel Ingersoll said:

I suppose that society—that is to say, a state or a nation—has the right of self-defense. It is impossible to maintain society—that is to say, to protect the rights of individuals in life, in property, in reputation, and in the various pursuits known as trades and professions, without in some way taking care of those who violate these rights. The principal object of all government should be to protect those in the right from those in the wrong. There are a vast number of people who need to be protected who are unable, by reason of the defects in their minds and by the countless circumstances that enter into the question of making a living, to protect themselvs. Among the barbarians there was, comparativly speaking, but little difference. A living was made by fishing and hunting. These arts were simple and were easily learned. The principal difference in barbarians consisted in physical strength and courage. As a consequence, there were comparativly few failures. Most men were on an equality. Now that we are somewhat civilized, life has become wonderfully complex. There are hundreds of arts, trades, and professions, and in every one of these there is great competition.

Besides all this something is needed every moment. Civilized man has less credit than the barbarian. There is something by which everything can be paid for, including the smallest services. Everybody demands payment, and he who fails to pay is a failure. Owing to the competition; owing to the complexity of modern life; owing to the thousand things that must be known in order to succeed in any direction, on either side of the great highway that is called Progress are innumerable wrecks. As a rule, failure in some honest direction, or at least in some useful employment, is the dawn of crime. People who are prosperous, people who by reasonable labor can make a reasonable living, who, having a little leisure, can lay in a little for the winter that comes to all, are honest.

As a rule, reasonable prosperity is virtuous. I don't say great prosperity, because it is very hard for the average man to withstand extremes. When people fail under this law, or rather this fact, of the survival of the fittest, they endeavor to do by some illegal way that which they failed to do in accordance with law. Persons driven from the highway take to the fields and endeavor to reach their end or object in some shorter way, by some quicker path, regardless of its being right or wrong.

I hav said this much to show that I regard criminals as unfortunates. Most people regard those who violate the law with hatred. They do not take into consideration the circumstances. They do not believe that man is perpetually acted upon. They throw out of consideration the effect of poverty, of necessity, and, above all, of opportunity. For these reasons they regard criminals with feelings of revenge. They wish to see them punished. They want them imprisoned or hanged. They do not think the law has been vindicated unless somebody has been outraged. I look at these things from an entirely different point of view. I regard these people who are in the clutches of the law not only as unfortunates, but, for the most part, as victims. You may call them victims of nature, or of nations, or of governments; it makes no difference, they are victims. Under the same circumstances the very persons who punish them would be punished. But whether the criminal is a victim or not, the honest man, the industrious man, has the right to defend the product of his labor. He who sows and plows should be allowed to reap, and he who endeavors to take from him his harvest is what we call a criminal; and it is the business of society to protect the honest from the dishonest.

Without taking into account whether the man is or is not responsible, still society has the right of self-defense. Whether that right of self-defense goes to the extent of taking life depends, I imagin, upon the circumstances in which society finds itself placed. A thousand men on a ship form a society. If a few men should enter into a plot for the destruction of the ship, or for turning it over to pirates, or for poisoning and plundering the most of the passengers—if the passengers found this out certainly they would hav the right of self-defense. They might not hav the means to confine the conspirators with safety. Under such circumstances it might be perfectly proper for them to destroy their lives and to throw their worthless bodies into the sea. But what society has the right to do depends upon the circumstances. Now, in my judgment, society has the right to do two things—to protect itself and to do what it can to reform the criminal. Society has no right to take revenge; no right to torture a convict; no right to do wrong because some individual has done wrong. I am opposed to all corporal punishment in penitentiaries. I am opposed to anything that degrades a criminal or leaves upon him an unnecessary stain, or puts upon him any stain that he did not put upon himself.

Most people defend capital punishment on the ground that the man ought to be killed because he has killed another. The only real ground for killing him, even if that be good, is not that he has killed, but that he may kill. What he has done simply givs evidence of what he may do, and to prevent what he may do, instead of to revenge what he has done, should be the reason given.

Now, there is another view. To what extent does it harden the community for the government to take life? Don't people reason in this way: That man ought to be killed; the government, under the same circumstances, would kill him, therefore I will kill him? Does not the government feed the mob spirit—the lynch spirit? Does not the mob follow the example set by the government? The government certainly cannot say that it hangs a man for the purpose of reforming him. Its feelings toward that man are only feelings of revenge and hatred. These are the same feelings that animate the lowest and basest mob.

Let me giv you an example. In the city of Bloomington, in the state of Illinois, a man confined in the jail, in his efforts to escape shot and, I believe, killed the jailer. He was pursued, recaptured, brought back and hanged by a mob. The man who put the rope around his neck was then under indictment for an assault to kill and was out on bail, and after the poor wretch was hanged another man climbed the tree and, in a kind of derision, put a piece of cigar between the lips of the dead man. The man who did this had also been indicted for a penitentiary offense and was then out on bail.

I mention this simply to show the kind of people you find in mobs. Now, if the government had a greater and nobler thought; if the government said: We will reform; we will not destroy; but if the man is beyond reformation we will simply put him where he can do no more harm, then, in my judgment, the effect would be far better. My own opinion is, that the effect of an execution is bad upon the community—degrading and debasing. The effect is to cheapen human life; and, although a man is hanged because he has taken human life, the very fact that his life is taken by the government tends to do away with the idea that human life is sacred.

Let me giv you an illustration. A man in the city of Washington went to Alexandria, Va., for the purpose of seeing a man hanged who had murdered an old man and a woman for the purpose of getting their money. On his return from that execution he came through what is called the Smithsonian grounds. This was on the same day, late in the evening. There he met a pedler, whom he proceeded to murder for his money. He was arrested in a few hours, in a little while was tried and convicted, and in a little while was hanged. And another man, present at this second execution, went home on that same day, and, in passing by a butcher-shop near his house, went in, took from the shop a cleaver, went into his house and chopped his wife's head off.

This, I say, throws a little light upon the effect of public executions. In the Cignarale case of course the sentence should hav been commuted. I think, however, that she ought not to be imprisoned for life. From what I read of the testimony I think she should hav been pardoned.

It is hard, I suppose, for a man to fully understand and enter into the feelings of a wife who has been trampled upon, abused, bruised, and blackened by the man she loved—by the man who made to her the vows of eternal affection. The woman, as a rule, is so weak, so helpless. Of course, it does not all happen in a moment. It comes on as the night comes. She notices that he does not act quite as affectionately as he formerly did. Day after day, month after month, she feels that she is entering a twilight. But she hopes that she is mistaken, and that the light will come again. The gloom deepens, and at last she is in midnight—a midnight without a star. And this man, whom she once worshiped, is now her enemy—one who delights to trample upon every sentiment she has—who delights in humiliating her, and who is guilty of a thousand nameless tyrannies. Under these circumstances, it is hardly right to hold that woman accountable for what she does. It has always seemed to me strange that a woman so circumstanced—in such fear that she dare not even tell her trouble—in such fear that she dare not even run away—dare not tell a father or a mother, for fear that she will be killed—I say that, in view of all this, it has always seemed strange to me that so few husbands hav been poisoned.

The probability is that society raises its own criminals. It plows the land, sows the seed, and harvests the crop. I believe that the shadow of the gibbet will not always fall upon the earth. I believe the time will come when we will know too much to raise criminals—know too much to crowd those who labor into the dens and dungeons that we call tenements, while the idle liv in palaces. The time will come when men will know that real progress means the enfranchisment of the whole human race, and that our interests are so united, so interwoven, that the few cannot be happy while the many suffer; so that the many cannot be happy while the few suffer; so that none can be happy while one suffers. In other words, it will be found that the human race is interested in each individual. When that time comes we will stop producing criminals; we will stop producing failures; we will not leave the next generation to chance; we will not regard the gutter as a proper nursery for posterity.

People imagin that if the thieves are sent to the penitentiary that is the last of the thieves; that if those who kill others are hanged society is on a safe and enduring basis. But the trouble is here: A man comes to your front door and you drive him away. You hav an idea that that man's case is settled. You are mistaken. He goes to the back door. He is again driven away. But the case is not settled. The next thing you know he enters at night. He is a burglar. He is caught; he is convicted; he is sent to the penitentiary, and you imagin that the case is settled. But it is not. You must remember that you hav to keep all the agencies alive for the purpose of taking care of these people. You hav to build and maintain your penitentiaries, your courts of justice; you hav to pay your judges, your district attorneys, your juries, your witnesses, your detectivs, your police—all these people must be paid. So that, after all, it is a very expensiv way of settling this question. You could hav done it far more cheaply had you found this burglar when he was a child, had you taken his father and mother from the tenement house, or had you compelled the owners to keep the tenement clean; or if you had widened the streets, if you had planted a few trees, if you had had plenty of baths, if you had had a school in the neighborhood. If you had taken some interest in this family—some interest in this child—instead of breaking into houses, he might hav been a builder of houses.

There is, and it cannot be said too often, no reforming influence in punishment; no reforming power in revenge. Only the best of men should be in charge of penitentiaries; only the noblest minds and the tenderest hearts should hav the care of criminals. Criminals should see from the first moment that they enter a penitentiary that it is filled with the air of kindness, full of the light of hope. The object should be to convince every criminal that he has made a mistake; that he has taken the wrong way; that the right way is the easy way, and that the path of crime never did and never can lead to happiness; that that idea is a mistake, and that the government wishes to convince him that he has made a mistake; wishes to open his intellectual eyes; wishes to so educate him, to so elevate him, that he will look back upon what he has done only with horror. This is reformation. Punishment is not. When the convict is taken to Sing Sing or to Auburn, and when a striped suit of clothes is put upon him—that is to say, when he is made to feel the degradation of his position—no step has been taken toward reformation. You hav simply filled his heart with hatred. Then, when he has been abused for several years, treated like a wild beast, and finally turned out again in the community, he has no thought, in a majority of cases, except to "get even" with those who hav persecuted him. He feels that it is a persecution.

Do you think that men are naturally criminals and naturally virtuous?

I think that man does all that he does naturally—that is to say, a certain man does a certain act under certain circumstances, and he does this naturally. For instance, a man sees a $5 bill, and he knows that he can take it without being seen. $5 is no temptation to him. Under the circumstances it is not natural that he should take it. The same man sees $5,000,000, and feels that he can get possession of it without detection. If he takes it, then under the circumstances that was natural to him. And yet I believe there are men above all price, and that no amount of temptation, or glory, or fame could mislead them. Still, whatever man does is or was natural to him.

Another view of the subject is this: I hav read that out of fifty criminals who had been executed it was found, I believe, in nearly all the cases that the shape of the skull was abnormal. Whether this is true or not, I don't know; but that some men hav a tendency toward what we call crime, I believe. Where this has been ascertained, then, it seems to me, such men should be placed where they cannot multiply their kind. Women who hav a criminal tendency should be placed where they cannot increase their kind. For hardened criminals—that is to say, for the people who make crime a business—it would probably be better to separate the sexes; to send the men to one island, the women to another. Let them be kept apart, to the end that people with criminal tendencies may fade from the earth. This is not prompted by revenge. This would not be done for the purpose of punishing these people, but for the protection of society—for the peace and happiness of the future.

My own belief is that the system in vogue now in regard to the treatment of criminals in many states produces more crime than it prevents. Take, for instance, the Southern states. There is hardly a chapter in the history of the world the reading of which could produce greater indignation than the history of the convict system in many of the Southern states. These convicts are hired out for the purpose of building railways, or plowing fields, or digging coal, and in some instances the death-rate has been over twelve per cent a month. The evidence shows that no respect was paid to the sexes—men and women were chained together indiscriminately. The evidence also shows that for the slightest offenses they were shot down like beasts. They were pursued by hounds, and their flesh was torn from their bones.

So in some of the Northern prisons they hav what they call the weighing machine—an infamous thing, and he who uses it commits as great a crime as the convict he punishes could hav committed. All these things are degrading, debasing, and demoralizing. There is no need of any such punishment in any penitentiary. Let the punishment be of such kind that the convict is responsible himself. For instance, if the convict refuses to obey a reasonable rule he can be put into a cell. He can be fed when he obeys the rule. If he goes hungry it is his own fault. It depends upon himself to say when he shall eat. Or he may be placed in such a position that if he does not work—if he does not pump—the water will rise and drown him. If the water does rise it is his fault. Nobody pours it in upon him. He takes his choice.

These are suggested as desperate cases, but I can imagin no case where what is called corporeal punishment should be inflicted, and the reason I am against it is this: I am opposed to any punishment that cannot be inflicted by a gentleman. I am opposed to any punishment the infliction of which tends to harden and debase the man who inflicts it I am for no laws that hav to be carried out by human curs.

Take, for instance, the whipping-post. Nothing can be more degrading. The man who applies the lash is necessarily a cruel and vulgar man, and the oftener he applies it the more and more debased he will become. The whole thing can be stated in the one sentence: I am opposed to any punishment that cannot be inflicted by a gentleman, and by "gentleman" I mean a self respecting, honest, generous man.

What do you think of the efficacy or the propriety of punishing criminals by solitary confinement?

Solitary confinement is a species of torture. I am opposed to all torture. I think the criminal should not be punished. He should be reformed, if he is capable of reformation. But, whatever is done, it should not be done as a punishment. Society should be too noble, too generous, to harbor a thought of revenge. Society should not punish, it should protect itself only. It should endeavor to reform the individual. Now, solitary confinement does not, I imagin, tend to the reformation of the individual. Neither can the person in that position do good to any human being. The prisoner will be altogether happier when his mind is engaged, when his hands are busy, when he has something to do. This keeps alive what we call cheerfulness. And let me say a word on this point.

I don't believe the state ought to steal the labor of a convict. Here is a man who has a family. He is sent to the penitentiary. He works from morning till night. Now, in my judgment, he ought to be paid for that labor over and above what it costs to keep him. That money should be sent to his family. That money should be subject, at least, to his direction. If he is a single man, when he comes out of the penitentiary he should be given his earnings, and all his earnings, so that he would not hav the feeling that he had been robbed. A statement should be given to him to show what it had cost to keep him and how much his labor had brought and the balance remaining in his favor. With this little balance he could go out into the world with something like independence. This little balance would be a foundation for his honesty—a foundation for a resolution on his part to be a man. But now each one goes out with the feeling that he has not only been punished for the crime which he committed, but that he has been robbed of the results of his labor while there.

The idea is simply preposterous that the people sent to the penitentiary should liv in idleness. They should hav the benefit of their labor, and if you giv them the benefit of their labor they will turn out as good work as though they were out of the penitentiary. They will hav the same reason to do their best. Consequently, poor articles, poorly constructed things, would not come into competition with good articles made by free people outside of the walls.

Now many mechanics are complaining because work done in the penitentiaries is brought into competition with their work. But the only reason that convict work is cheaper is because the poor wretch who does it is robbed. The only reason that the work is poor is because the man who does it has no interest in its being good. If he had the profit of his own labor he would do the best that was in him, and the consequence would be that the wares manufactured in the prisons would be as good as those manufactured elsewhere. For instance, we will say here are three or four men working together. They are all free men. One commits a crime and he is sent to the penitentiary. Is it possible that his companions would object to his being paid for honest work in the penitentiary?

And let me say right here, all labor is honest. Whoever makes a useful thing, the labor is honest, no matter whether the work is done in the penitentiary or in a palace; in a hovel or the open field. Wherever work is done for the good of others, it is honest work. If the laboring men would stop and think they would know that they support everybody. Labor pays all the taxes. Labor supports all the penitentiaries. Labor pays the warden. Labor pays everything, and if the convicts are allowed to liv in idleness labor must pay their board. Every cent of tax is borne by the back of labor. No matter whether your tariff is put on champagne and diamonds, it has to be paid by the men and women who work—those who plow in the fields, who wash and iron, who stand by the forge, who run the cars and work in the mines, and by those who battle with the waves of the sea. Labor pays every bill.

There is one little thing to which I wish to call the attention of all who happen to read this interview, and that is this: Undoubtedly you think of all criminals with horror, and when you hear about them you are, in all probability, filled with virtuous indignation. But, first of all, I want you to think of what you hav in fact done. Secondly, I want you to think of what you hav wanted to do. Thirdly, I want you to reflect whether you were prevented from doing what you wanted to do by fear or by lack of opportunity. Then perhaps you will hav more charity.

What do you think of the new legislation in the state changing the death penalty to death by electricity?

If death by electricity is less painful than hanging, then the law, so far as that goes, is good. There is not the slightest propriety in inflicting upon the person executed one single unnecessary pang, because that partakes of the nature of revenge—that is to say, of hatred—and, as a consequence, the state shows the same spirit that the criminal was animated by when he took the life of his neighbor. If the death penalty is to be inflicted, let it be done in the most humane way. For my part, I should like to see the criminal removed, if he must be removed, with the same care and with the same mercy that you would perform a surgical operation. Why inflict pain? Who wants it inflicted? What good can it, by any possibility, do? To inflict unnecessary pain hardens him who inflicts it, hardens each among those who witness it, and tends to demoralize the community.

Is it not the fact that punishments hav grown less and less severe for many years past?

In the old times punishment was the only means of reformation. If anybody did wrong, punish him. If people still continued to commit the same offense, increase the punishment; and that went on until in what they call civilized countries they hanged people provided they stole the value of one shilling. But larceny kept right on. There was no diminution. So, for treason, barbarous punishments were inflicted. Those guilty of that offense were torn asunder by horses; their entrails were cut out of them while they were yet living and thrown into their faces; their bodies were quartered and their heads were set on pikes about the gates of the city. Yet there was a hundred times more treason then than now. Every time a man was executed and mutilated and tortured in this way the seeds of other treasons were sown.

So in the church there was the same idea. No reformation but by punishment. Of course in this world the punishment stopped when the poor wretch was dead. It was found that that punishment did not reform, so the church said: After death it will go right on, geting worse and worse, forever and forever. Finally it was found that this did not tend to the reformation of mankind. Slowly the fires of hell hav been dying out. The climate has been changing from year to year. Men hav lost confidence in the power of the thumbscrew, the fagot, and the rack here, and they are losing confidence in the flames of perdition hereafter. In other words, it is simply a question of civilization.

When men become civilized in matters of thought they will know that every human being has the right to think for himself, and the right to express his honest thoughts. Then the world of thought will be free. At that time they will be intelligent enough to know that men hav different thoughts, that their ways are not alike, because they hav lived under different circumstances, and in that time they will also know that men act as they are acted upon. And it is my belief that the time will come when men will no more think of punishing a man because he has committed the crime of larceny than they will think of punishing a man because he has the consumption. In the first case they will endeavor to reform him, and in the second case they will endeavor to cure him.

The intelligent people of the world, many of them, are endeavoring to find out the great facts of nature that control the dispositions of men. So other intelligent people are endeavoring to ascertain the facts and conditions that govern what we call Health, and what we call Disease, and the object of these people is finally to produce a race without disease of flesh and without disease of mind. These people look forward to the time when there need be neither hospitals nor penitentiaries.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

SKAMOKAWA, WASH. TERR., July 14th, 15th, 16th.—This is a unique village, a fisherman's paradise. The inhabitants, from little boys and girls of seven to the old folks of seventy, all are experts in the use of rowboats.

Here Friend Thornburg, of the firm of Thornburg & Brooks, "Willie," as everyone delights to call him, the genial, earnest young Liberal, and most enterprising merchant in the county, gave me a right royal greeting.

This place is where a three-mile bayou empties into the Columbia river, in the midst of the lumber and fishing region. It consists of a hotel, a few stores, and a few dwelling-houses. In its rear, up the mountain, are excellent farming lands and many logging camps.

The lumber supply of Washington territory is prodigious. Regular shipments to the eastern markets were begun in 1885. Since the trade began the shipments each year hav doubled those of the preceding season, until this year. Next in importance to the lumber is the fishing industry. The Columbia river pack of salmon for 1887 was 375,000 cases, valued at nearly $2 000,000. This will be greatly exceeded this year. There are now 3,000 boats engaged in salmon-fishing out every night except Saturday. Great vigilance is used to enforce the law so that the fish shall not be exterminated. No one is permitted to capture salmon on Saturday nights, either by net or trap, nor before or after the prescribed season, under severe penalties. The season lasts one hundred nights, ending on July 31st. Then in September and October they hav a short fall season of about thirty nights.

Each boat will average a catch of six salmon per night—over a million and a half taken in one hundred nights. The size of the meshes of the nets is regulated by law, so as to prevent catching or in any way doing injury to the young or small fish. The fishermen receive $1 25 for each fish, regardless of size. Those taken vary from twenty-five to sixty pounds each. All the canneries hav to pay the same price for fish. The amount is decided on by the fishermen's union. A few years ago fourteen to sixteen cents per fish was all that could be obtained.

The canneries employ Chinese labor, but it is not true that there is anything dirty or objectionable in the canning of the fish. I visited several canneries and found the work done in a very systematic, neat, and cleanly manner. Those who purchase Columbia river salmon are sure of obtaining the very finest fish.

The fishermen are a hardy, jolly, generally reckless class. They work very hard, but spend their earnings freely. Many of them are outspoken Liberals. The most devoutly pious never fail to go fishing Sunday night. But this is in accord with Peter, the patron saint of fishermen.

Fishing for salmon is a good, paying business, but a very bad one for young men to engage in. Its uncertainty is its charm. Some nights only one or two fish; some nights fifty. To make $25 to $30 per night renders them dissatisfied with any regular work, however good the wages. They forget all the hardships and bad nights and remember only the big hauls; so become discontented. It has all the charm and excitement of gambling. At Skamokawa I had the pleasure to meet a host of right noble, good Liberals. They came in rowboats many miles. A few came from the mountains, by the one only road.

I had the good fortune here to meet S. F. Albert and wife. Friend Albert is the genial and very popular sheriff of Wahkiakum county, and his sprightly little wife one of the most devoted and energetic Liberals on the Pacific coast.

Here, too, I had the glad delight to meet Professor Seymour and his amiable and accomplished wife, daughter of Sister Saunders, of Portland. Professor Seymour is a brainy, intellectual man; an able, experienced phrenologist and hygienic physician; of ready wit, fluent of speech, and an effectiv worker for universal mental liberty.

It would take too much space to name the brave, genial, jolly host of friends I had the honor to shake hands with at Skamokawa. The river is full of them. I delivered four lectures at the improvised hall to large and deeply interested audiences, and left with regret, hopeful to be able to gratify the earnest wish of many to return there in the fall of 1889, accompanied by Mrs. Reynolds. Under any circumstances, should I ever revisit the coast, Skamokawa will be one of the points I shall be most anxious to make. Young Brother Thornburg promises to erect a handsome hall by the time of my return, to be dedicated to universal mental liberty. C. B. REYNOLDS.

That English Oath Bill.

Mr. Bradlaugh's amendment to his Oaths bill still causes division and strife among the Liberals and Radicals of England. The Northampton political organization which supports Mr. Bradlaugh passed at its latest monthly meeting a resolution to the effect: "That in the opinion of this meeting the value of the Oaths bill is taken away by the amendment recently introduced." This action of the Liberal and Radical Unions the junior member for Northampton regarded as very important and demanding his most serious consideration. Mr. Bradlaugh says:

"On each occasion on which I stood for election I invariably declined to stand as a mere delegate, but I repeatedly stated that in the event of my disagreeing with my constituents on any serious question I would at once place my resignation in their hands. On learning this resolution from the public papers I at once, in accordance with such pledge to my constituents, wrote to the secretary asking him to submit my letter to the executiv. In this I asked for the formal judgment of my constituents as to my action on the Oaths bill, and stating that if that judgment should be unfavorable it would be my duty to resign my seat."

In response to this the secretary of the Union summoned the proper committee, and on the day the committee met the Union also held a general meeting. The following resolution was passed:

"That this meeting desires to express, and hereby expresses its entire confidence in Mr. Bradlaugh, and acknowledges with thanks that he has worked sedulously and conscientiously in the interests of the community, and especially of the working classes."

Mr. Bradlaugh, by another resolution, was invited to attend a meeting of his constituents and explain the matter further, an invitation which he promptly accepted. It is probable, therefore, that the voters of Northampton will support the amendment, as their disagreement with its author is not of sufficient moment to induce them to accept his resignation.

In the Pall Mall Gazette Dr. Hunter, M.P., urges further objections to the bill, two or three of which only are of importance. He writes:

"The objection to his amendment is twofold. It makes the performance of a public duty an occasion for a needless inquiry into private opinions on religion. And although it satisfies those who are able to say they hav no religious belief, it prevents the large class of persons who are not in that position, and, at the same time, who object to oaths, from making an affirmation. The oath, as construed by the English courts of law, is inconsistent, not with their religious opinions, but with their common sense. There are many persons who, without being Quakers, entertain the objections of that sect to oath-taking. The bill would not be a settlement of the question, but if passed with the acquiescence of the Liberal party would be an obstacle for years to come to a satisfactory and final settlement. The bill as introduced by Mr. Bradlaugh was based upon sound Liberal principles. The inconvenience, such as it is, of the present law, is not of so urgent a character as to make any sacrifice of principle necessary."

To these cavilings Mr. Bradlaugh replies that there are no words in the bill, as amended, which authorize inquiries into a person's belief; but, on the contrary, eight statutes which do authorize such inquisition are repealed by the bill. That all people who object to taking an oath can say either, "I hav no religious belief," or, "The taking of an oath is contrary to my religious belief." And that people not Quakers who entertain that sect's objections to oath-taking must surely come within the last-quoted words, because the Quaker objects that the oath is contrary to the scriptures, which say, "Swear not at all." But Mr. Bradlaugh does not say how a man who rejects both scriptures and oaths-taking, yet has a religious belief, would get around the amendment. The need of a bill of some sort Mr. Bradlaugh urges as follows:

"It is all very well for Dr. Hunter to say that there is no urgency, but surely I may be permitted to plead the urgency of my own case and its almost ruinous consequences to myself. I may plead the case of a full score justices of the peace whom I know personally, all of whom are liable to serious penalties as the law now stands. I may plead the Freethinkers absolutely outlawed in Scotland at the present moment. I plead the insults to Freethinking jurors of daily repetition, and add my regret that Dr. Hunter thinks that these cases are not urgent. I utterly deny that I hav made any sacrifice whatever of my principle, and challenge Dr. Hunter or anyone else to state in precise terms the principle I am alleged to hav sacrificed."

But after all that is said, there can be no doubt that the bill with the amendment is not so good as the bill without the amendment. Mr. Bradlaugh himself admits this. It practically makes the people of no religious belief a sect who are allowed to affirm as a favor, as is a Quaker. Most Freethinkers will object to taking a right thrown at them in this way. Second, Dr. Hunter is right in saying that the bill is not a final settlement of the question, and if its passage will defer a satisfactory settlement it should not pass. Mr. Bradlaugh is in Parliament without it, and it is not so important that Freethinkers should sit on juries as it is that all men should possess equal rights as citizens—not as favors but as a natural and inalienable right.

We are sorry to see Mr. Bradlaugh pursue any course which shall dim the luster of his victories over the foes of liberty. Success should not make him conservativ, as it usually does smaller men. The bargaining for the reading of the bill—what in this country is called log-rolling—is politics, not statesmanship.

The Fellows That Solomon Meant.

The serene death of Courtlandt Palmer, following upon his generous and unselfish life, has been a source of wonderment to the Christians, inasmuch as they do not know just what to say about it. According to Christian tradition every Freethinker dies with the clank of devils' chains in his ears and visions of frightful hobgoblins filling a sulphurous air before him. As children they hav been frightened with these pictures, as men they hav believed them, and as religious teachers they hav passed them down to the younger generations. And now to hav one of the foremost Infidels of the land, a man of such public prominence that every paper in the country chronicles his death and last words—to hav such a man die in tranquility, not only without fear, but as bravely as any hero ever died, is too much for their weak brains to comprehend. The sermons preached about the occurrence are wonderful, and the comments of the religious press astonishing.

The views of these preachers and editors may be cataloged as follows:

1. As Mr. Palmer lived a good life, was generous, able, and a prominent man in his community, he must hav been a Christian, though he did not intend to be. Therefore, of course he died peacefully.

2. That he died as a Stoic, and there is a great difference between Stoicism and Christianity, though Stoicism may sustain a philosopher in his last hours. Therefore, Mr. Palmer's death is a warning.

3. That though Mr. Palmer was an Agnostic, he had hope of a future life, as the Christians hope, and consequently died resignedly trusting in the future.

4. That as Mr. Palmer was an Agnostic, he could hav no hope of a future life, and died bravely and peacefully because he believed that death is an eternal sleep, with no future punishment for his Infidelity in this world. The religious holders of this last view usually add a quotation from Solomon.

Mr. Palmer's death has also been the occasion for a revival of the old tales about Voltaire and Paine, with some animadversions upon David Hume because he chose to crack a joke just previous to his final dissolution. It is useless to try to enlighten the preachers and editors who talk thus. They are steeped in their own religious stupidity and would not admit themselvs to be wrong were it shown them never so plainly. Besides, it is their business to warn the living from following in the footsteps of men like Courtlandt Palmer. If the world should say, Here is a philosophy antagonistic to Christianity which makes men good, generous, humanitarian, loving, kind, and enables them to pass away with minds in a normal condition, neither afraid nor fanatical, and the world should conclude that that philosophy is good enough for it to liv and die by, then the preachers' occupation would be gone, and they could no longer liv on the fears of their followers. To prevent this, they moralize and lie and deceive and conceal and distort and squirm, and speak words, words, words without meaning or sense, and then pose as great teachers and logicians, and destroyers of a heresy which if accepted would eternally damn the world!

It is of no sort of use to tell these fellows that Voltaire did not die in fear; that Paine passed away serenely; that David Hume's example was, to say the least, more cheering than Jesus Christ's; that scores and hundreds of great and good Infidels hav died calmly and serenely, while scores and hundreds and thousands of Christians hav died in fear of God and the devil, shrieking in agony, and uncomforted by their religion. They would still lie about the dead and deceive the living, would still conceal and distort and squirm, and deluge the public with their sentences which hav no sense and words without meaning, and still pose as world-saviors and great teachers and logicians. Solomon must hav had just such fellows in his mind when he wrote what we now find as the eleventh verse of the twenty-sixth chapter of Proverbs.

Two Views.

We find the following in a recent issue of the New York World:

"There were several incidents of the funeral of Courtlandt Palmer which did not come under the observation of the reporters present. Probably a more heterogeneous audience has been rarely seen together in this city, and especially in the luxurious parlors of a wealthy man's house. Leading Socialists and Freethinkers sat or stood side by side with prominent society women and notable orthodox pulpit lights. The Jewish church was represented by Rabbis Gottheil, of this city, and Moses, of Louisville, Ky.; literature, by Moncure D. Conway, Edgar Fawcett, and George Montgomery; society, by Mrs. Charles Stebbins, Mrs. Putnam, and other ladies; politics, by Commissioner Andrews and Mayor Hewitt; the law, by Colonel Ingersoll, T. B. Wakeman, and William Travers Jerome; the church, by Heber Newton and Dr. Rylance, and medicin by Dr. Abbe and Dr. Swasey. All these representativs of different professions assembled to do honor to the man who set society thinking, and who, as Heber Newton eloquently said, 'in this city, not over-given to intellectuality and ruled by Mammon, dreamed a dream of intellectual progress and of the brotherhood of man which he strove with all his might to realize.' The holding of two services, that conducted by Colonel Ingersoll and that by Mr. Newton, struck many of those present very strangely, but the second service, which was attended by only about fifty people, the Freethinking element leaving almost precipitately when it was announced that a religious service would be held, and of which little notice has been made, was in some ways the more notable of the two. Contrary to report, Mr. Newton did not read the Episcopal burial service, but simply one or two psalms and prayers. The hymn, 'Lead, Kindly Light,' was exquisitly sung by Mr. Coxe, and then Mr. Newton delivered an address which in loftiness of thought, beauty of imagery, and eloquence of delivery almost equaled Colonel Ingersoll's magnificent effort and was fully worthy of as wide an audience. Mr. Newton knew and esteemed Mr. Palmer, and spoke from his heart. He paid a fine tribute to Ingersoll, and a finer to the dead man. His remarks were characterized throughout by a freedom from cant and by a lofty thought which should at least hav won for him the presence and attention of that part of the assemblage which left so hurriedly after Colonel Ingersoll had closed. The few who remained to the religious service had been present also at that which preceded it, and the question is being asked as to which portion of the assemblage showed the least bigotry and the most charity."

That is one side of the matter. The other side is stated by Helen H. Gardener in Secular Thought. She says:

"I did not stay to hear the mockery of prayer and burial cant which were read over the remains of this brave man who scorned and nobly fought, with all his force, the creeds and dogmas of a cruel faith. How any man, whose heart within his breast held but one particle of human tenderness, could stand or kneel by Courtlandt Palmer dead, and—with a creed that damned for evermore that tender, gentle soul—retain his reason and his creed, transcends my mind. If the clergyman did not believe his creed, what mockery of all that was most dear to Courtlandt Palmer would his mouthings be! For loyalty to what he thought the outspoken utterance of his real self was to him, whose passion for the truth was first and holiest, what the heart's best blood is to the brain of man. Hypocrisy he loathed. And yet here, kneeling beside his bier, is one who believes he is damned—an everlasting convict for his unbelief—or else this clergyman is a mouthing hypocrit, who does the service at a master's nod, which he himself discards and holds as naught, except as it may serve to lash into subservience the weaklings of the pack. A hypocrit at Courtlandt Palmer's grave, babbling of Gods and of a future life, is a greater insult to the memory of that truthful man than one who truly thinks that he is lost, who sees no loophole for the good and great by which his creed may yield, or stretch, or break, to cover all mankind and set at naught his very deity. There is no middle ground.

"He is a hypocrit and sells his soul for place, or to his mind, his friend and brother is lost forever, to himself and us, and but deserves the whip and lash, the scourge and thumbscrew of a world of pain, where angry Gods and gleeful demons join in endless deviltry. There is no middle ground.

"The Christian creeds are true and our loved one is damned, or they are false and hold their million dupes by fraud and pretense, such as good men scorn and Courtlandt Palmer loathed. There is no middle ground.

"This preacher, mouthing over Courtlandt Palmer dead, is but an insult to the name of friend. Integrity of mind must damn his friend. Integrity of heart but damns himself. In either case he is not fit to stand erect by Courtlandt Palmer's grave, nor kneel thereat—except in shame and grief for his unworthiness to touch the shoes of him who sleeps within. My heart is all too full to write as I would wish. There are no words at present at my command to giv the gorge of indignation force and scope. How dare a Christian wag his tongue at such a time and place as this, and read a service which holds only threats above the lifeless form of one he called his friend? Can impudence and cruelty add one grain to this?"

The truth lies midway between the two. There was no disposition on the part of the Christian side to insult either the dead or the living. We understand that previous to his death, Mr. Palmer consented that a "Liberal Christian" minister might attend the funeral. He did this to alleviate his wife's distress. Mr. Newton recognized that really he had no business there, saying that, but for certain circumstances, his attendance would be presumptuous. His published address contains nothing but praise for the dead, and the worst breach of good faith was the singing of a religious hymn. But if Mr. Palmer consented to Mr. Newton's presence, his friends should not find too much fault. Remember the living wife, whom the departed husband loved too deeply to forbid all rites which to her are a source of consolation to the mind if not to the heart.

However, the World has spoken too highly of Mr. Newton. His words at the funeral show him to be of gentlemanly instincts, but as a minister Helen Gardener more nearly describes him. Mr. Newton is a member of a church whose creed he does not uphold. Intellectually he is nearer to Courtlandt Palmer than to his mother church. Moreover, he some time ago wrote a book in which he very vulgarly abused his religious opponents—a proceeding which Liberals will never forget. But as he was at the time smarting under his bishop's lash, applied for heretical teaching, it may be possible to forgiv him if his future conduct shall warrant such exercise of mercy. While we regret that any enlightened and civilized people should cling to the superstitions of the church, we cannot forget that wives and families hav their rights, with the consent of the dying, and surely he would be il-Liberal indeed who would deny to a grief-stricken wife any consolation that did not compromise the reputation of the husband. The world knows what Courtlandt Palmer was, and ten thousand Heber Newtons could not tarnish his fame as a noble and independent Freethinker. Colonel Ingersoll's eulogy will stand through all time as the fitting tribute to the man over whose ashes it was spoken.

"True Liberty."

The pope recently published an encyclical letter on Liberty. Its scope is narrowed to Catholic ideas of that subject, and its publication at this time is doubtless intended to influence Catholics in Italian politics. A Roman Catholic journal givs the following summary of the letter:

"Liberty is liable to abuse. Modern liberties are abuses. Natural liberty belongs to men as rational beings. It is derived from the soul. It is, therefore, dependent upon the intellect. True liberty, therefore, follows the dictates of the intellect. Liberty needs to be helped by a law. This law is an eternal law. The individual law applied to society becomes human law. Liberty is, therefore, restrained by obedience—(a) in the individual to the natural law; (b) in society to the human law. Liberalism proper refuses this obedience, and its own pleasure is its only law. Another form of Liberalism refuses obedience to eternal law in the state, but acknowledges it in the individual. Liberty of worship should be restricted by the true religion, and Atheism is contrary to reason. Religion in the state confirms true morality. Liberty of speech and writing should be restricted to the moral law. Liberty of teaching should also be restricted by the moral law, and therefore all teaching should fall within the truth. Liberty of conscience should be restricted to the true religion, and within these limits boldly defended. Liberalism bears evil fruits. God allows evil for greater good. Rulers should keep this example before them. But Liberalism allows no tolerance. Man should submit to God, which Liberalism does not allow. One form of Liberalism wishes to separate the church from the state, and allow the church to work thus separated. Another form denies any power to the church further than that of exhortation. Some wish the church to go with the times. All these opinions are false and should be substituted by the true doctrin previously laid down. The church desires her sons, except under certain conditions, to take part in public affairs where possible. Saving faith and morals she approves every kind of government."

The jaunty manner in which the church has here disposed of Liberty, paving the way, step by step, to the final position of the church that heresy must be suppressed by law, and that the church followers must take part in politics and act as the church directs—all of this would be amusing were it not too serious to pass over lightly.

The reasoning of the pope in this letter is the traditional sophism of the Jesuits. Every priest graduated from a Catholic college can repeat the formula. False premises and assumptions are what it is composed of, and it always leads to the same conclusion, which is, that the church has the right to rule the world, and the people must obey her or suffer God's displeasure.

The church holds that liberty is liable to be abused because she also holds that God (i.e., the church) grants the liberty, and consequently it is abused when the conduct or thought of men is contrary to the rule of the church. Such an idea of liberty is held only by tyrants. To declare modern liberty an abuse is absurd, for the abuse of liberty consists in abusing the person, property, or reputation of our fellows. Modern liberty, so far from doing that, is the very force which secures individual freedom and at the same time secures protection for person, property, and reputation. The Catholic church limits liberty to belief in the Catholic church and obedience to her officials. That she calls "true liberty." Then follows the condemnation of Atheism and heresy and the assumption of the right to suppress them. So, too, she demands the alliance of church and state to promote "true morality," because the church orders what "true morality" is, and, consequently, becomes the real state. Liberty of conscience and liberty of worship is likewise restricted within the limits of "true religion." And as the church defines the "true religion," she again rivets her chains upon the people. Then she restricts liberty of speech and writing to the moral law, which moral law is, of course, of her enacting, and here once more is the church on top. Desiring her sons to take part in government, she holds them to her will because she is the authority for faith and morals, and government is a part of morals. Therefore the real meaning of this encyclical letter is that everybody but obedient Catholics is denounced here and damned hereafter, and that nothing and nobody can be right except the holy Roman church with the pope as her mouthpiece.

But the opinions of an aged Italian gentleman on religious matters, which are meant by the title Liberty, would be of small moment to us here in the United States were it not for two or three things. One is, the history of the church for which he speaks, and another is the dangerous growth in numbers and power of that very church right here in the land of supposed freedom. With every prospect of that church getting a large share of governmental control in the near future, it is well to stop and think what will happen in that event. If we judge by history, the answer is plain. And if we judge by this latest published pronunciamento of the self-same church whose history is so bloody and so damnable, is not the answer equally plain? No liberty but the liberty to belong to the Catholic church! Liberty to think as the church thinks; liberty to speak and write as the church dictates; liberty to worship at the church's altars, and liberty to vote as the church directs! That is the liberty described by the pope as "true liberty," and the liberty which he proposes to substitute for "modern liberty." The prospect is indeed pleasing.

Editorial Notes.

THE Graphic, printed in Denver, Col., thus talks to the ministers and lay bigots who are trying to enforce Sunday laws in that city: "Some cranks are complaining against the Sunday sale of ice cream, soda water, and the mysterious but delicious milk-shake. There are some people who would make this world a place of torment in the mistaken notion that they are working for the glory of God. But the dark days of the cerulean laws hav gone forever, and if a man craves a milk-shake on Sunday he has a perfect right to tap the first lemonade stand he sees. The more dispensers of the thirst-slaking fluids there are, just at this time, the better it is for humanity, and the less the liability of a fracture in the Commandments."

HUGH HARRISON has been nominated by the Prohibitionists of Minnesota as their candidate for governor. In accepting the nomination Mr. Harrison got off these remarks: "I call upon the people of Minnesota, the Bible-reading, God-fearing people, where are they going to vote? Will they vote for a president who honors Robert G. Ingersoll? [Cries of "No, no."] Where is the Irish vote going? To a party that respect Ingersoll? A party that reveres Pope Bob more than it does Pope Leo XIII.? I will go into this fight to win. Admit my qualifications for the place, but I want the vote of every God-fearing, rum-hating Republican and Democrat." Mr. Harrison appears to be something of a religious enthusiast.

THIS is the way the Maurepas, La., Gazette greets two recently elected members of the legislature: "At the late election two ignorant backwoods Bible-whangers, the Hon. N. W. Warren, of Bienville, and Hon. John Franklin, of Vernon, varied the monotony of sky-piloting in their backwoods gospel-mills by becoming 'reform' candidates for the legislature, and most unfortunately they were returned as elected. These eminently pious seekers of the loaves and fishes and longers after the fleshpots of Egypt, notwithstanding their professions of being followers of the 'meek and lowly Jesus,' who commanded those who would come unto him to sell all they had and giv to the poor, went for the swag with all the ardor of veteran 'reformers.' These two reverend gentlemen each opened the house of representativs with prayer once, for which, notwithstanding it being unconstitutional, they received $50 each. They also received $60 each as mileage. From all such pious, reform legislators, good Lord, deliver us!"

THE Catholic church boasts that she is the refuge and the haven of poverty. That she dispenses heavenly treasures without money and without price, and that through her gates the way to paradise is perfectly free. But it seems by the testimony of Nicolo d'Aloe, a poor Italian immigrant, before the Congressional investigating committee, that this is not so. When asked what church he attended it was hard to make him understand, because he knew of but one church, the Romish. He said he had tried to go to church here, but he found that it required money to go to church in this country. In reply to Mr. Guenther's further questions, the witness said that he had endeavored to attend two churches since he came here, and on each occasion he had been refused admittance because he had no money; five cents had been demanded for a seat at each church, and because he had not got it he could not go in. The next witness was Guiseppe Bedome. He, too, went to church in Italy, but when he went here to the church in Mulberry street they wanted five cents, and so he did not try again. These men were undoubtedly as well off as though they had been admitted to the churches, but in view of the Romish church's great pretensions the incidents are interesting.

THE New York correspondent of the Galveston News writes to his paper this story about two New York reformers, both now deceased: "Courtlandt Palmer and Stephen Pearl Andrews had an agreement that the one who died first was, if possible, to communicate from the spirit land with the survivor. A year was to be allowed for the phenomenon to take place, and in case it did not, the conclusion was to be that the theory of Spiritualistic intercourse was false. Andrews was a Spiritualist. Palmer was an unbelieving investigator. Andrews, who was commonly called the Pantarch, founded the Colloquium, a society of philosophers of diverse views, to meet for discussions. That was the original of the Nineteenth Century Club, of which Palmer was president and chief financial sustainer. The two men were anxious to settle the question, while at least one lived, whether the spirits of the dead communicated with the living. So they made the agreement described. Each memorized a sentence, and this was, if feasible, to be sent by the one who died to the one who yet lived through some medium hundreds of miles away. Nobody else was to know the words. Andrews died last autumn, and Palmer, although without faith, waited for the promised message. It did not come. The Pantarch was frequently represented as speaking through various mediums here and there, but he did not mention Palmer or the compact. Not long before Courtlandt Palmer's death he talked with several friends about the unkept promis by Stephen Pearl Andrews, and declared that if the expiration of the year did not bring the proof to the contrary he should set down Spiritualism as a sure delusion. As he died before the end of the year, and without, so far as is known, disclosing the test sentence to anybody, this attempt to ascertain the truth as to Spiritualism comes to nothing satisfactory."

Letters from Friends.

ALBION, MICH., Aug. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber and reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for a number of years and can hardly get along without it, and most heartily commend you for your Liberality and tolerance in allowing all parties to be heard in its columns. But I fully agree with De Lespinasse, in the number of July 28th, that our Spiritualistic writers are the most "tiresome friends that one can possibly be afflicted with," and I would most earnestly appeal to the Burr family to "giv us a rest." W. BIDWELL.

MINNESOTA LAKE, MINN., July 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much interested in your valuable paper and its cartoons. I hope to get more subscribers in this—this Lord's country, where, however, I cannot see any good done by his power. His weather is bad; it rains twenty-eight days. I hoped that would kill the chinch-bugs, but it did not, and they are destroying our crops. If prayers arc not answered—as Mr. Bell told our Methodist brethren in a lecture that made them very angry—then we are losing time in telling God that he is a very powerful beiñg and can do anything. We want more bells ringing the truth, as Mr. Bell did here, at Delavan and Minnesota Lake, to show our faithful brethren how far they are behind in progress. We want a host of Liberal lecturers to visit us oftener; then we shall reach our heaven—on earth. Notwithstanding the failure of expected help from some Liberals, I am not discouraged, and we shall try to hav more lectures. E. S. GLICK.

MILTON, DAK., July 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I write you this to say that we hav had three lectures by Mr. Bell, of Chicago. I heard that he was in Jamestown, Dak., and I could not bear the thought of his going home without having him ring his bell for us. So we sent for him, and I must say I liked the ring; it is clear, distinct, and every time the clapper strikes the holy grunter quails. Only one minister came out to hear him, and after Mr. Bell got through the audience called on him to reply, but he could not be induced to go forward. No; this man, who is receiving a salary, who is the paid guardian of the Christian religion, when it comes to real work jumps the track and lets the train go to the devil. I hav heard some of his members say it looked very cowardly. Well, it is characteristic of the whole tribe of preachers.

I like Mr. Bell, and I would say to all brother Liberals, if you want lectures in your towns giv Mr. Bell a call, and I know he will be appreciated by all good, sound Secularists. His lectures are giveu in a manner that impresses his audience with his sincerity. S. E. HAIGHT.

LINCOLN, NEB., July 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: After several weeks of ineffectual bickering, the Liberals of Lincoln hav at last completed organization, electing the following officers: President, Geo. B. Scott; secretary, John S. Johnson; treasurer, S. B. Timmons; executiv committee, A. T. Gowe and A. W. Day, with officers ex officio. For the present we will work as an independent society, but will soon obtain an American Secular Union charter.

There are quite a number of Liberals here—I suppose at least two hundred—but public sentiment is so strong in favor of Christianity that the most of them are afraid to become identified with the cause of freedom for fear that it will injure them in business.

We hav secured Mr. S. P. Putnam for a lecture September 9th. The managers of the leading Opera House—Crawford and McReynolds, who control most of the opera houses west of the Missouri river—hav refused to rent us the house for that occasion, saying it would hurt the reputation of the house, and they could not afford to lose the good will of the church people. We hav secured a large hall that will seat two thousand people, and will giv the people a free lecture. It is a little uphill work now, but I think we will soon be strong enough to do some good in this church-cursed city. In a population of forty-five thousand we hav seventy-five churches, and on Sunday there is no other place to go to, except one suburban park where gospel services are held from 2 o'clock until 6, so the people are naturally church-goers and a hard class for Liberals to deal with. But in the name of Freethought and Reform we will do our best, and indulge the hope that some good may result from our labors.

Fraternally, A. T. GOWE.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Aug. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Another of truth's, liberty's, humanity's defenders has fallen—alas, too soon! I never knew him personally, but I hav some of his grand and lofty poems he sent me with a two-dollar bill four years ago, and his photograph with that great, expanded brow, that temple of mentality, spirituality, and ideality, with too small and weak a basis of vitality and physical hardihood. I had written him of my long devotion to unpopular truth and the costs I had paid in every sense in its defense, and he responded with sympathy and appreciation. I ever drank in with avidity his poems, essays, and public discourses, and appreciated him for his humanity, his lofty manhood, his inspiring ideal of prospectiv possible higher, purer, and better life on earth, the life of a dominant frontal, upper brain like that of his own. Courtlandt Palmer was one of nature's few noblemen, and as a truth seeker and mind-reader I can worship that grand and humane organism. In his great poem depicting the three progressiv stages and upward transitions of humanity, his first line reads:

I stood upon the uplands of the earth.

Yes, he was born there, was naturally there, lived there, and reached down after and lifted humanity up to "the higher law," to the high plateau of life where he lived, and to this summit of manhood he would fain elevate humanity. He has now verified and will verify his own words:

And when the birth of us
Shall to the death of our bodies giv place,
Then all the worth of us,
Freed from the earth of us,
Deathless shall liv in the life of the race.

Pure, ideal, logical, methodical, exalted, expanded, comprehensiv, humane, and refined Courtlandt Palmer, indelible upon my mental tablet, farewell! J. H. COOK.

BROWNFIELD, ME., July 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Our town of about twelve hundred inhabitants has now three sky-pilots or gospel bummers—one Congregationalist, one Baptist, and one new-fledged Universalist. To see how the latter is petted, it is not so much of a wonder why men play the hypocrit and become sky-pilots.

Where are we drifting, that almost all are so indifferent to the signs of the times? I hav read "Danger Ahead," and loaned it to a minister of this place, and he said it was a big scare, so we see that Protestants and Catholics will unite to fight a common foe. We ought to hav ten such books where now there is one, for before we Freethinkers know it we will be bound hand and foot by the church-made laws. I am the only Freethinker in this place that openly and publicly declares his opinion on these subjects; and you all well know that it takes some moral courage to face public opinion and bigotry. I wish some one like A. J. Grover, Ingersoll, or any other able writer would in every Freethought paper sound the warning note, so that we need not lie asleep while the churches and their minions enact laws to persecute all that will not subscribe to their narrow and bigoted creed. Suppose the Freethinkers were in the majority and should pass laws as detrimental to the welfare of so-called Christians. what would be the result? Would they not call it persecution? What else could they call it? And the worst of the whole is, we are so indifferent to the fate of others. But when our turn comes, we shall wish we had been awake to the fact that they are only waiting until they get a few more laws of the Comstock kind, then we shall, like Elmina, Walker, Bennett, Heywood, etc., feel the soothing effect of Christian mercy, which past history tells us is not to be desired. Now, I hope all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will wake up, especially at the coming election, and look out and giv any and all churches as little support as possible, and if they can't go the whole hog, of the two evils, as between the Protestant and Catholic, choose the least. H. W. SEAVEY.

LEHIGH, IA., July 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed postal order to pay for another year's subscription to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER We take great pleasure in looking at the pictures and reading the diverse opinions expressed in its columns. But we do not say that all others who entertain a difference of opinion are, as some claim, fools and liars. No; such men and women, although Spiritualists, are honest in their opinions and are at liberty to giv their honest convictions as they see fit, and learn in that light. The diversity of ideas makes us express our thoughts very differently one from another, and it is not necessary, besides, it is utterly impossible, for all parties to arrive at the same conclusions, especially about matters not definitly demonstrated. And for this reason I think it would be wise for a majority of so-called Freethinkers to allow others the same rights which they ask for themselvs. At any rate, everyone should be allowed the free expression of ideas, without being stigmatized with such personalities as fool, liar, etc. This is rather too much of a Christianized, bigoted spirit to be tolerated amongst good, broad-minded Liberals, no matter if they are Atheists, Materialists, Spiritualists, or Agnostics. And all which hav elevated and cleared their skirts from the corrupted pools of Christianity and hav classified themselvs with any of the above-named branches of Liberals will scorn the idea of belittling themselvs to stoop down to use such low, slangy language, instead of using stubborn facts and arguments which will prove to the contrary. I trust the day will soon dawn upon the Freethinking community when they shall respect one another's rights more than they do, and then, but not until then, shall they go forth in a body to meet the foe and gain the victory.

Mr. and Mrs. Burr's letters were very interesting to me, although I am a Materialist. And I am always willing to hear all sides, and hav due respect for all such people, and would encourage them in their investigations.

ROBERT FLEMING.

KENT, O., Aug. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to propound the following questions to the honest Liberals and Freethinkers of our much-loved country. Is it not time that we unite to resist the papal monster that is fast entwining its pythonic coils around us, to deprive us of our much-loved free schools? Are we to sit idle until our arms are pinioned before we bestir ourselvs to grasp with the Jesuitical cunning and pythonic strangulations being used by the papal hierarchy to despoil and contaminate what little virtue our country has in possession? It is not strange that the old parties will cater to the Roman church when she holds the balance of power in our country, and none can be elected unless they control the Catholic vote. Is it not time the Liberals and Freethinkers nominate a candidate who would take the public stump and enlighten the common people on the subject of rescue? When can we expect to grow if we do not organize for that purpose? There are thousands of thinking voters who are only waiting to vote right who dare not or who will not let their views be known for fear of public [illegible].

Are we to sit idle and see the fagots piled for our destruction? Do we need greater warnings than to see the wills and contributions of our Liberal associates stolen by first one set of sacred thieves and then again by another, and the very last wish and decree of the donor ignored and his wealth applied to build up such institutions as he willed should not be fostered? Can we not see the intrigue being used to legislate against those who cannot accept the superstitious dictates of ecclesiastical authority? Giv us a chance to vote, that we may show our adverseness to ecclesiastical authority and dogmatic rule. We must not allow the contaminations of priestcraft and papal interventions to destroy the purity of our free school system, neither free speech nor free press, for in these lay our strength, and like Samson of old, shorn of our agency of power we are forever impotent to resist our would-be destroyers. Let us down the monster before it is everlastingly too late. No weapons are needed but free speech and free ballots. A. D. SWAN.

COOPERSTOWN, PA., Aug. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It amazes one to observe the tenacity with which many alleged champions of the Woman's Rights cause cling to the Bible as the "inspired word of God," when it so indisputably teaches the subjection of woman. I am in favor of Prohibition. I do not see much that is objectionable in Woman Suffrage. But how inconsistent it is in a man to say he is a Prohibitionist, i.e., a Woman Suffragist, and at the same time to affirm that the oldest chestnut in the universe, the Bible, is the inspired criterion of his conduct, his morality, his principles, etc.!

I quote a few passages for the edification of Christian Prohibitionists who say a woman should be permitted to enjoy all the privileges of her husband: "Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection." "But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence" (1 Tim. ii, 11, 13).

Think of it, ladies! That inspired old bachelor said you ought not to so much as "teach"—so much as tell your husbands it is unbecoming in them to get drunk and abuse their families. All God requires of you is to keep on "learning in silence with all subjection." Nor hav you any right to "usurp authority" over your husbands by going to the polls and voting Prohibition; for you might thereby hinder them from making brutes of themselvs and your home an orthodox hell. And why? Read on: "Because Adam was first formed, then Eve." Oh, the sublimity of such reasoning! Such uncontrovertible logic is only to be found in the "book of books," the chestnut of chestnuts. It must hav cost God and Paul, jointly and severally, a mighty effort to get such principles clinched by an argument like that.

Poor women! They shall not even smile and look up joyfully in their husbands' faces if the tyrants happen to come home sober, but rather shall they hang their heads—"adorn themselvs in modest apparel with shamefacedness and sobriety," or "adorn themselvs with good works" (1 Tim. ii).

I hope no Christian lady will ever be put to the necessity of either going nude or utterly disregarding the inspired man's teachings. Ah, yes, dear ladies, these passages are inspired, or they would not be a part of the inspired chestnut! M. H. VEON.

GROVELAND FARM, ORE., July 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: On July 15th we had the pleasure of listening to two splendid lectures from our noble president, S. P. Putnam. His subjects were "The Bible" and "The American Republic." The last-named was a grand lecture, and delivered to a full house, composed principally of Christians. The reason of this new departure was, a mountebank had announced that he would make a reply to S. P. Putnam. Brother Putnam presented his unanswerable arguments in his usual effectiv way, and was followed by this creature—Braden—in his usual style, which consists of coarse personalities, sneers, denials, and ruffianly abuse of everyone that does not let Braden think for him. He denounced Mr. Putnam as a coward and falsifier, and all Liberals as idiots; compared them to hogs, young robins, and a variety of other pleasant things—but did not stoop so low as to compare any of us to that moral leper Clark Braden, for which we giv him thanks.

I inclose an item in regard to the hanging of a most brutal murderer:

Landreth, the Polk county murderer, was hanged at Dallas last Friday. It will be remembered that Landreth murdered his stepdaughter a few months ago, using a huge knife to accomplish his fiendish purpose. Fourteen frightful gashes were cut in the girl's body, any one of which would hav proved fatal. Although he denied illicit intimacy with his stepdaughter from the time of his arrest till his fatal drop from the gallows last Friday, the public is willing to believe none of his statements, and from his brutal bearing feels that the crime was committed to cover up the wretched condition of the girl, which would soon hav become public in motherhood. Hanging of brutes like Landreth is necessary to the public safety. He went down to his death unmourned by one friend.

It was a terrible affair, but he was a true Christian and faithful saint, and doubtless has his halo fitted by this time. He told the minister who came to pray with him that his peace was made with God. Then he kindly marked the passage in his pocket Bible, "Come unto me, all ye weary and heavy-laden, and I will giv you rest," and sent the Bible to his wife. I should think that Bible, hot from the hand of the murderer of her child, would be a great comfort to the grief-stricken mother. What a friend we hav in Jesus, etc.

You will see by "News and Notes" in Freethought how the grand army of Liberalism is increasing in Oregon. What a grand fight Brother Putnam is making here! Oregon will soon be the banner state in Liberalism. Then we can all say, as the old man did in prayer-meeting, "Oregon is good enough for me." I don't think that story is "a chestnut," so will giv it here: A large number of the faithful were gathered together at a "love feast"—I think they call it—and the minister called on all who wished to go to heaven with him to arise. All arose but one old man, who sat quietly near the pulpit. The minister looked sorrowfully at him and said, "Why, my old friend, don't you want to go to heaven?" "No, sir, I don't; Oregon is good enough for me."

Wishing you grand success in the future, I remain,
Yours for universal mental liberty, SARAH C. TODD.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., July 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Once again I take up my pen in defense of Freethought and free speech, that all may be free to think, act, and speak as one thinks best, provided we do not injure our neighbor. I hav been listening to a vile tirade of holy lies against one of our ablest speakers, Colonel Ingersoll, a man the church advocates might pattern after with advantage in all things. The speaker is a Colonel Copeland. Who he is we do not know, but that he is one of Los Angeles county's floating population and makes his bread and butter by hurling mud at his betters and defending poor God, the garden of Eden, snake, deluge, and all. The speaker said Ingersoll reminded him of a certain bird. This bird was gifted with unusual powers of flight, watching with eager eye the beauties of the world spread out beneath him, but all the object he can discern is carrion, and that bird was a buzzard. What a comparison for a lowly follower of the lamb to make of his fellow-man! Why? Because he picks out passages in God's holy writ and tells the truth about the Bible, and says it is unfit to be read among decent people. I suppose he thinks he has given Freethought its death-blow. They seem to be having quite a powwow here, and the Lord is very much pleased, no doubt.

Is it possible these people defend these absurd Bible stories through ignorance? If so, we pity them; but it is presumed to be policy with the educated clergy and teachers, for we know they know better, for if they really believed the old legend we would not hear of so much crime among them. But Freethought will continue to spread until it envelops the whole earth, in spite of bigotry. As I hav not been long a resident of this beautiful city of The Angels near the sea, I do not know how it stands as to Freethought, but will try and find out in the near future. But it seems to me this lovely climate, with its summer heat made bearable by its gentle zephyrs wafted from the sea twelve miles away, would unwarp and giv its population a disposition to love one another, and not want any hell. Yet I fear it will take a good deal of fine climate and sledge-hammering lectures such as our talented lecturer Dr. York, of this state, can giv, to crack the crust of prejudice and superstition with some, as their narrow minds cannot see God in the clouds or hear him in the wind, but expect to see him on the other side, with hat, coat, boots, and all, sitting on a throne.

Yours truly, MRS. O. A. BENJAMIN.

GRAHAMSVILLE, FLA., July 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I suppose so many will reply to Elmina's questions, "Where is one grand painting produced by or through a single medium? Where are the invaluable prescriptions that great physicians should be able to now transmit to us?" that my reply, though I but draw the outlines of proof stored within the brain, will lodge in the wastebasket. Anderson, "the spirit artist," has produced many "grand" drawings. I hav seen them in many homes, where they were greatly appreciated for their grandeur and on account of their close resemblance to spirit friends. At Lake Pleasant, a lady who had but one arm took the rostrum. Her cardboard was circulated for inspection. She had sixteen thicknesses of cloth put over each eye; then a four-double handkerchief tied over them. Then various dishes of paint were placed on a stand, with brushes and board. It was about midday. She worked rapidly, occasionally making some witty remark to ladies near her. She painted three pictures at that séance. People professed to get grand tests of spirit friends by her painting wreaths in which were buds and flowers typical of spirit friends. I saw one at the home of Dr. Fairfield which was "grand," each bud and flower representing spirit friends, which she described to him. As regards clairvoyant doctors and "prescriptions," I hav some of the latter; hav been very sick, and sent a lock of hair miles away to a medium; received her prescriptions; used them, and, when M.D.'s had failed to help me, received great benefit; used this method for months, not informing my doctor at all how I was, and everything worked like a charm. I hav tested many clairvoyants, and know that they can tell all the symptoms of a patient without tiring a patient with questions. Clairvoyant doctors hav done all I could expect outside of miracles, which, as a scientist, I don't hope for.

I am wondering how long THE TRUTH SEEKER will continue the Spiritual and spicy element it now maintains. I long since remarked, "Even the cartoons are worth the price of the paper," and now its value in my estimation is doubled. Though an ardent Spiritualist, I admire argument. I wish all Spiritualist papers success, for even though I tire of the Christian tendency of most of them, the "Christian Spiritualists" need them. I "sympathize with Materialists and Agnostics"—especially Si Slokum and "the BadgerBoy."

I often wonder if the "refined" Spiritualists who hav so much use for "God," "Jesus," and "Christ" consider how much those words are used in the slums. Those words will do occasionally in argument, but I really am disgusted with the common use of them in Spiritualist papers. THE TRUTH SEEKER at present is Spiritual enough for me, and if it is "gross" it surely has less "rotten timber" than some Spiritualist papers. I hav often thought that Materialists generally had too much fear of the "rotten timber" of Christianity, but Mr. and Mrs. Burr's acknowledgment givs me new hope that Materialists would admit it if they got solid tests. The trouble seems to be to get them to investigate fairly and enthuse them with the rational idea that spirit manifestations cannot be obtained except through natural laws and forces. I am pleased to raise corn without witnessing the sprouting process; I would be equally as willing a spirit should hav darkness to produce a negativ aura, necessary to draw to itself a tangible form. Mrs. Burr seems to appreciate natural phenomena, instead of asking for miracles. Fraternally, J. A. DOANE.

MILWAUKEE, ORE., Aug. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am truly sorry that Mrs. Ritchey has got discouraged so soon. If she knows of a Christian paper that will giv me the chance which THE TRUTH SEEKER givs her, I will, at least, assume a position which I am willing to defend without equivocation.

Mrs. Ritchey started out courageously. She was first going to upset Darwinism and then proceed to the other defenses of Infidelity, and she said she "would be a double-dyed coward" if she held her peace. Now, after skipping all the points she had raised, she proposes to hold her peace.

She says Smith did not believe that the Bible teaches that the sky is solid, because he knew that there were metaphors in other places conveying the opposit idea. Then she quotes from Smith a passage showing he did believe this, and justifying it on the ground that the Bible writers "describe things as they appear rather than as they are," and that in this respect they agree with the ancient myth-makers of Greece, Italy, and Germany—which is true. It is also true that accompanying these false statements about physical facts are commands from God for the slaughter of helpless women and children captured in unprovoked and aggressiv warfare, the killing of people for a difference of opinion, and for the perpetration of every conceivable barbarism and murderous crime. Mrs. Ritchey—if she knows—will indeed be a "double-dyed coward" if she does not tell what was the need of a special revelation to convey these absurd notions of the physical world, and to urge the Hebrew nation to a career of murder and barbarism in which other nations succeeded almost as well without any revelation.

Mrs. Ritchey then quotes this from another writer: "One stage among these mysterious processes was the separating of the waters enveloping the earth into the waters above and the waters below." The watery vapor is diffused equally throughout the atmosphere, and when at any point it becomes condensed into drops it begins to fall toward the earth. There is less than vapor enough in the air at any one time to make six inches depth of water over the whole earth. So there is no expanse "between the waters above and the waters below."

Mrs. Ritchey says that the literal meaning of the word rakia is, "the expanse." Smith says that the idea of solidity is the fundamental idea implied in the word and all its derivativs. The ideas are exactly opposit. I know nothing of Hebrew, and Mrs. Ritchey may be a better scholar than Smith. I once heard a Hebrew scholar say that a certain passage in Job was a mistranslation—that Job's wife advised him to bless God and die. The learned Dr. Scott says of the Hebrew word Azazel that this great and terrible name of deity has been variously rendered by learned and erudite scholars, as God, the devil, and a he-goat. It looks, to one entirely unfamiliar with that wonderful tongue, as if a language the separate words of which had such a wide range of meaning was liable to more or less ambiguity, and not exactly adapted to an infallible revelation.

Mrs. Ritchey has hunted up several passages in the Bible which she thinks hint at rational ideas concerning the world we liv in. I will not dispute that some sensible ideas are scattered here and there through that old book, but why anyone, who professes to think that the whole book is a revelation from God, should so laboriously pick them out and ask us to be surprised at them is a wonder. Is it a surprising thing that a revelation from God should contain a little sense?

Newton, in the preface to his "Principia," says that Pythagoras, who wrote about 500 B.C., taught the true relations and motions of the solar system. He taught that the sun was in the center, and that all the planets, including the earth, revolved around it; that Mercury was nearest to the sun, Venus next, the earth next, then Mars, then Jupiter, then Saturn. Dr. Draper tells us that Pythagoras obtained his knowledge from India. Yet, after these correct ideas of the solar system had been taught, not vaguely but plainly and in detail, for at least two thousand years, Galileo went to prison and Bruno to the stake for proclaiming them, because they were "contrary to the holy scriptures."

I asked Mrs. Ritchey if she believed that "in six days the Lord made the heaven and the earth, the sea and all that in them is." She says she does not, and that the Bible teaches no such doctrin, and she justifies this declaration on the ground that the word day is sometimes used indefinitly in the Bible. I was not quoting from one of those indefinit places, but from a statute law upon which God himself, according to the Bible, has put a literal interpretation over and over again. Listen: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt not do any work . . . for in six days the Lord made the heaven and the earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested on the seventh day." God commanded that people should be stoned to death for working on the day on which he rested. And all Sabbath legislation and Sunday laws are based on the literal and only possible honest interpretation of this passage. When Christians are trying to work out the impossible problem of reconciling the Bible with science, the word "day" becomes very elastic; but when they wish to legislate away other people's rights, or enact tyrannical laws, the word "day" becomes entirely definit.

If the editor can find room, I will soon furnish some of the facts which justify the assertion that man has existed on this earth for at least hundreds of thousands of years.

I hav read up on the "harmony" of the two genealogies, and hav found as pitiable a mess of quibbling as that relating to the days of creation. For instance, Smith goes through the whole list of Luke and Matthew in parallel columns, till he comes to the last name in Luke's list, and then he coolly puts Mary in place of Joseph, as it is in the text. If Smith had any regard for Luke, would he lay him in the lie like that? No doubt Luke might hav been lying, but in what sense are they to be called believers who so glibly assume that he was?

Mrs. Ritchey discusses the eternity of matter. She affirms, in the first place, that all known substances are composed of several elements. But suppose we use the word "substance" with a little broader meaning. Then an elementary substance will be one that is simple, indivisible, and, hence, indestructible; and a compound substance will be one that is divisible into two or more of these indestructible substances.

Mrs. Ritchey thinks the conclusion irresistible that every combination of matter had a combiner. The combinations effected in this world are all caused by sunlight; and as the stars are seen I infer that the same causes are producing the same effects throughout the universe. But Mrs. Ritchey says there was a distinct time when the several elements were brought together. That time is now, as much as ever, in the infinit past. If there ever was a time when the elementary substances existed and no chemical action had taken place, the burden of proof rests upon those who affirm it.

With regard to the distinction between varieties and species, if we say that all animals which interbreed freely when crossed are varieties and all whose offspring are more or less infertil are species, we only reason in a circle without settling anything or making any addition to our knowledge. There are different degrees of fertility among crosses and hybrids. If the theory of evolution were true, animals or plants with a common ancestry would ultimately become so different, sexually, as to become incapable of crossing. If the theory of the creation of distinct species were true, there should be no degrees of fertility. I hav perfect confidence in Darwin's statement that, as a matter of fact, "the degree of fertility both among first crosses and hybrids graduates all the way from zero to perfect fertility." This corresponds with the theory of evolution, but not with that of creation.

In a work just out by Professor Le Conte, entitled, "Evolution in Its Relation to Religious Thought," occurs the passage: "Now, in fact, by diligent search such intermediate links between well-recognized species hav been found in some cases. . . . Certain forms hav long been known from widely separated regions and universally regarded as distinct species, as distinct as any. Then, by minute examinations of intermediate regions, a complete series of intermediate forms hav been picked up. This has occurred not only in one case but in many cases, and not in birds only but in many other classes—examples increase with our increasing knowledge. The only answer to such evidence is that these are not true species. Now see the fallacy lurking here! They define species as ultimate elements of taxonomy, as distinct without any intermediate links, and then require us to find such intermediate links; and, finally, when with infinit pains some such links are found, they say: 'Oh, I see! we were mistaken; they are only varieties.'"

Mrs. Ritchey says she is aware "that the imperfection of the geological records is a great resource of evolutionists." It seems to be much too perfect to suit her, else why does she confine herself in quoting authorities to writings upward of twenty years old? Mrs. Ritchey thinks a horse's foot is clumsy and that it is a disadvantage to him, in point of speed, to hav been elevated upon his middle toenail. The bear is a plantigrade. He walks down on his heel like the eohippus. Now, if Mrs. Ritchey were mounted upon a bear and I upon a horse and we were to hav a race, I would, in time, distance her as far as I hav in this argument.

Mrs. Ritchey observes that "the production of some five or six intermediate forms is not sufficient to prove the evolution of the horse from the marsupial," etc. Five or six? Well, that is old! That count must hav been made "previously before the late war." Over thirty distinct forms hav been described between equus and eohippus.

Again: "It seems strange that evolution should deprive an animal of any of its toes so long as it was supposed to be constantly using them." It seems strange that evolution should deprive a polliwog of his tail, but it has to go.

I do not believe in spontaneous generation. I do not believe that matter is dead and that there is an impassable gulf between the dead and living. Evolution covers the whole ground that has been investigated, and, I believe, covers all that exists.

I am not good at solving "knotty points." Mrs. Ritchey wants to worry me about a little fool fixing which she says exists about half-way down or up the intestins. "It is about the size of a goose-quill, and three or four inches long." She wants to know what it is for. She seems to hav found the first use for it—to puzzle me. On the subject of that nameless little excrescence I am entirely Agnostic. But because I don't know anything about it that does not seem to be a sufficient reason for giving up evolution, which agrees with everything I do know. Dr. Johnson says that "he who determins what he knows by what he does not know is not to be admitted among reasonable beings."

For Mrs. Ritchey I entertain the highest respect. I hav not presumed on her ignorance, but, in attempting to set her right, hav felt that my task would hav been easier if she had posted herself on the subject down to date. I contemplate the person who at this day essays to overthrow evolution with a feeling akin to that of the Irishman when he saw the bull preparing to butt the locomotiv off the track. He said, "I admire your pluck—but dom your judgment!"

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Pretty Maid of Picardy.

I stopped to rest a summer day,
The sun glow like a brazen sea—
Then sweet her welcome was to stay,
The pretty child of Picardy.

She brought me flowers fresh and fair,
With piquant mien so sweet to see—
Inheritance of charming air,
The inborn grace of Picardy.

A bird-like fashion had her hands;
Her face beamed with sincerity—
Sweet pioneer of prairie lands,
This little maid of Picardy.

Her bright bouquet of garden flowers,
Each named, and each instructing me,
Was not, though choicest of her bowers
Yet like the rose of Picardy.

O sunny land upon the Rhine!
Your banner bears the fleur-de-lis,
Yet sweeter far this flower of mine—
The bonny maid of Picardy.

Infidel.

The word is derived from the Latin fides, faith—fidelis, faithful; the preposition in making it infidelis, unfaithful. In its general meaning, Infidel refers to one who has no faith that the Bible was written by inspiration of an unknown being away up in the skies somewhere, sitting upon a great white throne like a king, and generally designated by the term God. He who rejects this idea, and does not believe that Jesus and all the fabulous stories concerning him hav any origin in truth, is regarded as an Infidel. The true Infidel is one who spurns error, from whatever source it may arise; will hav nothing to do with falsehood, wrong, crime, deceit, hypocrisy, or villainy of any description. He loves the truth for its own sake; loves investigation, science, and ratifies all belief by evidence. He proves all things, and while putting aside the evil and the false, holds fast to that which is good and true. He is honest and honorable; the good man worthy of confidence and respect; square and upright in his dealings; doing right not because he expects a reward or fears punishment, but because it is the best thing to do always. To be an Infidel, in the usual acceptation, is to be really and truly good and great. Some of the greatest, wisest, noblest, and truest men and women of this and other countries were Infidels. Many of the greatest benefactors of the human race were not churchmen but Infidels. Nearly all reformers of this and other times hav been styled Infidels. The term is rather to be coveted, since to liv up to all its requirements, to its grandest meaning, in all its manifold bearings, is to be wise, good, great, and true. S. H. W.

"Little Phil."

THE HERO OF WINCHESTER.

Before me on the wall hangs a portrait of General Sheridan. I gaze with admiration upon the features of this brave and noble soldier and recall the many deeds of valor he performed.

Philip Henry Sheridan was born of Irish parents in Ohio, on March 6, 1831. He was a poor boy, and at the age of twelve years he began work in a country store, where he made only fifty cents a week. He was very fond of books and studied with deep interest books of military history and biography. Little did he think that his name would some day crown the pages of military history.

He entered West Point Military Academy, where he graduated in 1853, at the age of twenty-two. His first military experience was in Texas and Oregon, where he did good service as an Indian-fighter. An interesting and thrilling story is told of his early days. One day while Sheridan was outside the fort with two other men a band of Indians swooped down upon them. The chief jumped from his horse to seize his prisoners, when Sheridan instantly sprang upon the animal's back and galloped to Fort Duncan. Hastily summoning his troops, he rushed back to save his two friends. The enraged chief sprang toward him, when a ball from Sheridan's rifle laid him dead upon the ground. Thus Sheridan's quick thought and his superb bravery had saved his own life and that of his friends. In 1861 he was made captain, and in the summer of that year he served as president of a military commission to adjust claims in Missouri. In the winter of 1861 he was made chief commissary of the Army of the Southwest, and participated in the battle of Corinth on the staff of General Halleck. In May, 1862, he was made colonel of a Michigan regiment of cavalry. His first exploits were successful and the country began to realize the worth of his gallant services, and from this he rose rapidly. In July, 1862, he was placed at the head of a brigade of cavalry with the rank of brigadier-general. He was a splendid cavalryman, and in August he defeated Faulconer's cavalry in Mississippi. In September he was in command of a division of the Army of the Ohio. He took part in the battles of Perryville and Stone river, and for his gallant fighting in the latter he was made major-general of volunteers. He also participated in the great battles of Chickamauga and Mission Ridge, and in April, 1864, was made chief cavalryman of the Army of the Potomac.

During the Richmond campaign he made several destructiv raids on General Lee's army, and in the Shenandoah valley campaign he won several victories. His great Winchester ride has passed into history as one of the greatest acts of the war, and has won for General Sheridan the name of "the hero of Winchester."

He did good services in the campaign against Petersburg and Richmond, and his military career is one of the most brilliant in American history. After the war he commanded an army in Louisiana and Texas, and enforced the "reconstruction" acts there, for which he was removed by President Johnson in 1867. He was made lieutenant-general of the United States army on March 4, 1869, and in 1888 he rose to the rank of general. GEO. J. REMSBURG.

[General Sheridan died on the 5th inst. at his summer residence, Nonquitt, on the shore of Buzzard's bay, in Massachusetts. Thus passed away a noble soldier, a brave hero, and a true friend and lover of humanity. The country he helped to preserve mourns his loss.—ED. C. C.]

Correspondence.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Aug. 3, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I send to the Corner a sketch of the life of "Little Phil." It is rather long, but if you can find space for it I would be pleased. General Sheridan was, I presume, a Catholic, but it is not his religion that I admire; it is the noble deeds he performed in behalf of his country.

Yours truly, G. J. R.

COAL CREEK, TENN., Aug. 2, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I now will write to you for the first time. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER. My grandpa takes it. I like to read the Corner. I hav the "Story Hour" and "Lessons for Little Folks," and I think them splendid. Our school is out. My studies are geography, grammar, arithmetic, spelling, and the Fifth Reader. I am nine years old, and I hav two sisters. I guess I am tiring you, so I will close. Yours truly, CLARA LEINART.

HARMONY DISTRICT, July 27, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to any paper. I will do the best I can. I am ten years old. I hav three brothers and three sisters. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER about six months and likes it very much. We liv two miles from the railroad track. Martha Deming wishes to know the real definition of the word "Infidel." Hoping to see my letter in print, I will close for this time.

Your unknown friend, LUCINDA CLARK.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., Aug. 1, 288.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Here I come again to offer one of my little effusions, but I hope you will not let me crowd away others who hav better things for the Children's Corner. I like to see young writers come to the front, and am glad you encourage all such. Where is Darlina Bell? I am always interested in her stories. Let us hear from you, Darlina, and your Southern home.

With best wishes for the Children's Corner and the woman at the helm, I am, Respectfully, MARY B. FINCH.

Nature appears in a very similar garb to the youngsters, no matter in what department she shines. Little three-year-old was out in the fields the other day, and came running in with, "I saw a pansy and I was going to pick it, and it was a butterfly and it flied away."

She Saw the Gold.

"Mamma, I know it's true about the golden streets in heaven."

"Why, how do you know, Maud?"

"Because, when I was on deck with nurse last night something made a noise and the sky split clear across, and then I saw the gold shining through."

The Savage and the Magician.

Professor McAllister, the prestidigitator and ventriloquist, happened to be traveling across lower Idaho some years ago on his way from one town to another. It was in the days of early stagecoaching, before railroads were quite so plentiful as at the present time. The professor one afternoon, before the show commenced, in wandering about the streets of, I think it was Lewiston, encountered on the outskirts of the town a small band of Indians. Two or three companions were with him. While chatting together, looking about and observing things generally, McAllister became quite familiar with a mongrel dog owned by the redskins, whom he proceeded to pet nonchalantly.

"Fine dog," said the professor.

"Ugh!" grunted the buck.

"How much you sell him for?" asked the magician.

"Ugh! two dollar," replied the buck, holding up a pair of dirty fingers to indicate the amount.

"Him very fine dog," said McAllister, stroking the cur down the back and taking a gold piece from the end of his tail.

"Hi! hi!" exclaimed the redskin, looking on in astonishment, his eyes ready to start from his head in excitement.

"Him very fine dog indeed," quietly continued the professor, this time taking a whole handful of coin from the cur's tail, and picking stray pieces from his mouth, nose, and ears, which he transferred to his pockets.

Strange noises were heard proceeding from the interior of the animal. He groaned and laughed and howled and barked, at all of which the poor deluded redskins stood in the utmost awe and astonishment, and couldn't for the life of them understand what had come over the spirit of the animal. It was hard to tell which was the most surprised, the Indians or the dog. After filling his pockets with gold and taking another fistful from the cur's tail the professor left the redskins in peace. He had not gone ten minutes before the latter pounced upon the poor, doomed animal and cut him wide open. Like the goose that laid the golden egg, there was nothing inside, and it is but fair to presume that the only reward was a fine feast upon ribs of roast dog, browned to a turn.

A Sample Bit of Misery.

A small boy who happened to bruise his leg said to his mother: "O mamma! how awfully it must hurt to be a colored man!" "Hurt, my dear? Why, what do you mean?" "Why, don't you know, I tumbled down this morning and made that black spot on my leg, and it's just as sore as it can be all the time."

Not Comforting Assurance.

A little girl while on a visit to her grandmother had been seriously ill, and, as she grew better, was spoken of as convalescent. Thinking it would be very smart to use a long word, she wrote home: "Dear mamma, I am happy to say that I am convulsiv."

Quieting.

A little Burlington girl persisted in singing while her grandfather was taking his nap. She explained that she was "trying to sing grandpa's nose to sleep."

A LITTLE boy up-town who has just learned to say his prayers, with considerable opposition, was at breakfast the other morning and the waiter was putting lumps of sugar into his coffee. When the fourth lump went in the boy put his hand on the waiter's arm. "Amen," he said, briefly. "Why, Tommie, what do you mean by that?" inquired his mother, greatly shocked. "That means I've got enough," replied the youngster, with his mind on his devotional exercises.

MAMMA was looking out of the hotel window, and observing a man who weighed at least three hundred pounds, called to baby, who was only three years old, to "come and see the poor thin man." The sympathetic little dear rushed to the window, looked out, then up at mamma, and remarked, "Mamma is speaking ironically." Somewhat astonished, mamma asked, "Do you know what that means?" "Why, it means," with a superior look, "mamma is only giving baby taffy."

THE first infant prodigy.—"Papa, how old was Methusaleh when he died?" "Nine hundred and ninety-nine years, Rollo." "And what was his business?" "Boy preacher."

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader aloug, and to induce him to take the autidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by Credit these Discoveries to James Lick, Infidel.

From the New York Sun.

Highly interesting news comes from the great Lick telescope. A few weeks ago we referred to the discoveries that had been made with it in the Orion nebula and Saturn's ring system. Since then its powers hav been tried upon many other celestial phenomena with the most gratifying, not to say astonishing, results. It is plain that not only is this the most powerful telescope in the world, but that, planted on a mountain-top in the superb'y clear air of the California coast, it is far and away the most wonderful instrument of vision that has ever been applied to the assistance of the human eye. Professor Holden's recent descriptions of its performances appear to fully warrant the expectation that we are on the eve of some most important discoveries to be announced from Mount Hamilton. Already the great lens has revealed undreamed-of things. So surprising hav been its revelations, that the director exclaims in these words:

Our final conclusion is that we hav to use the large telescope in a new way. There is absolutely nothing to be taken for granted, and there is no object in the whole heavens which we must not observe as if viewed for the first time.

Again, in speaking of the powers of the great telescope, which he is just learning to use, Professor Holden says:

I am, as you know, familiar with the use of large telescopes, having observed for many years with the great refractor at Washington, but I confess I was not prepared for the truly magnificent action of this, the greatest of all telescopes, under the best conditions. I hav had such views of the bright planets, Mars and Jupiter, of nebulæ, the Milky Way, and some of the stars as no other astronomer ever before had.

But let us take an example of these wonderful revelations. Every owner of an amateur's telescope knows the celebrated ring nebula in the constellation of Lyra. It is an exceedingly beautiful phenomenon, hanging there against the black background of the sky like a most delicate, yet perfectly formed ring, or wreath of smoke. It is only when we reflect on its real size that the mind passes from admiration to awe at the sight of this ring. If our solar system were placed in its center, the gigantic sweep of that luminous ellipse surrounding us would belt the heavens as with a new and grander galaxy. The form of this object, and the fact that it is nebulous in character, hav naturally led to many speculations based upon its resemblance to the nebular rings, out of which, according to La Place's hypothesis, the planets of our system were formed. Here was an actual phenomenon in the heavens which showed at least that there could be such things as nebular rings.

The best telescopes hav shown a few faint stars near the ring and one within it, but nothing that could be regarded as evidence of any probable connection between the stars and the ring. But at one glance the Lick telescope has revealed a marvelous structure. Here is Professor Holden's account of it.

This bright nebula has been looked at by every amateur and professional astronomer, by every large and small telescope in the world. Sir John Herschel describes it as a ring and figures a small star following it. Lord Rosse, with his six-foot reflector, gave five small stars outside of it and none inside. Mr. Lassell, with his four-foot reflector, figures it with thirteen faint stars in an oval outside and one inside the ring. So I saw it with the Washington refractor of twenty-six inches aperture in 1875. Our first look at this nebula with the thirty-six inch telescope showed a great variety of new detail, and a careful examination has disclosed to us not only the single star inside, but likewise eleven others inside the inner oval or projected on the bright nebulosity between the outer and the inner ovals. Not only this, but it is obvious that the plan on which this nebula is built is that of a series of ellipses or ovals. There is first the ring of faint stars outside the nebula; then the outer and inner bounding ovals of the nebulosity; next a ring of faint stars around the edges of the interior ring, and finally a number of stars critically situated on the various parts of the nebulosity and outer oval. The object is entirely a new one in its appearance and in its suggestions as seen here.

One cannot read this description without recognizing the strong probability that there is an intimate connection between the nebulous ovals and the rings of stars. Here, then, it seems, we behold a corner of the universe where the great work of creation is now actually in progress. Here in this cosmic workshop of Lyra are scattered raw materials and finished solar bodies; rows of suns ablaze with pristin light, and masses of unformed vapor, in whose bosom the carbon atoms may be floating which, in the ripeness of time, shall assume forms of beauty and life. There are other spots in the heavens where stars and nebulous matter are mingled in a way that suggests a close relationship, but none so remarkable as this discovered by Professor Holden. Even the curious group called the Pleiades, where, as recent photographic discoveries hav shown, nebular masses and streams are mingled in the strangest fashion with the stars, there is nothing so remarkable as the concentric rings described by the director of the Lick Observatory. In the constellation of Aquarius there is a small nebula—small, that is, as seen from the earth, though enormously large in reality, which presents the suggestiv phenomenon of a globular mass, apparently surrounded by a flattish ring, recalling the appearance of Saturn. But even this must be regarded as a less interesting object than the ring nebula of Lyra now appears to be, with its marvelous wreaths of suns and sun stuff.

What Professor Holden says of his views of the planets also givs us reason to expect most interesting discoveries within our own system. He remarks that "a transit of the shadow of one of Jupiter's satellites recently observed has given us quite new ideas on the subject of the refraction and density of the atmosphere of this planet." Jupiter has been assiduously observed by many astronomers within the past ten years because of certain strange appearances on its disk, such as the celebrated "red spot;" and any news that may come from Mount Hamilton about it will be most eagerly received. At least we may reasonably expect to hav considerable light thrown upon the questiou whether Jupiter, a world whose surface is a hundred and twenty times as extensiv as that of the earth, is just emerging from a semi-solar into a planetary condition.

The Lick telescope has been mounted on its pier only a few months, but already it may fairly be said to hav opened up a new vista of creation. It is gratifying to know that this marvelous instrument of research is in the hands of a man who so promptly givs evidence that he will use it, not as many great telescopes hav been used, for mere technical, humdrum observations, but for the exploration of the universe in which our little globe is but a particle.

Balaam's Ass Heard From.

From the New York Sunday Dispatch, August 5th.

An editorial in last Thursday's issue of the Mail and Express bitterly assails the memory of the late Courtlandt Palmer on account of his Freethinking views. The article bears the earmarks of Deacon Elliot F. Shepard, and the spirit which animates it would do credit to those fine old fanatics Calvin and Knox, who gloried in the temporal destruction and spiritual damnation of those who refused to accept their religious dogmas as truth.

Deacon Shepard's canting tirade will not affect the opinions of the thousands who knew, esteemed, and loved Courtlandt Palmer, nor will it be likely to impair the growth and usefulness of the Nineteenth Century Club, which Mr. Palmer was instrumental in founding for the discussion of great social, moral, and religious problems. Biblical objurgations are not arguments, and no person skeptically inclined will be moved to accept the Christian religion as true beyond all doubt by editorials written in the peculiar vein adopted by Deacon Shepard in this instance. On the contrary, fair-minded men will arrive at the conclusion that Deacon Shepard should pay more attention to the command of the great founder of Christianity, "Judge not, lest ye be judged."

Courtlandt Palmer was a philanthropist, and the chief end and aim of his existence was to alleviate the sorrows and sufferings of his fellow-men. That he was sincere in his beliefs and disbeliefs is beyond a doubt, and nobody this side of the grave will ever know whether his conclusions were right or wrong. In any case, we do not believe that the man who did so much to lessen the burdens which weigh so heavily upon unfortunate humanity will be doomed to everlasting torment for exercising his honest judgment according to the best light afforded him.

In conclusion, we beg leave to call Deacon Shepard's attention to the following paragraph, taken from the book he is so much given to quoting on all occasions, appropriate or otherwise:

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrits! for ye are like unto whited sepulchers, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones and of all uncleanness. Even so ye outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

A WET TIME.—

Then Moses heard the people weep throughout their families, every man in the door of his tent: and the anger of the Lord was kindled greatly; Moses also was displeased.—Num. xi, 10.

Gems of Thought.

WHAT shall we say of the wisdom of those, including nearly all who occupy influential positions, who persist in thinking that preparation for successful and complete living (which is the purpose of rational education) is best effected by learning to speak and write after the manner of two extinct peoples, and by gaining knowledge of their chief men, their superstitions, their deeds of war, etc.—who, in their leading school, devote two hours per week to getting some ideas about the constitution of the world they are born into, and thirty-six hours per week to construing Latin and Greek, and making verses, of small sense or none; and who, in the competitiv examinations they devise, giv to knowledge of words double the number of marks which they giv to knowledge of things? That, it seems to me, is not a very worshipful degree of intelligence which fails to recognize the obvious truth that there is an Order of Nature, pervading alike the actions going on within us and without us, to which, from moment to moment, our lives must conform under penalty of one or other evil; and that therefore our first business must be to study this Order of Nature. Nor is estimation of this intelligence raised on contemplating the outcome of this established culture, as seen in Parliament; where any proposal to judge a question by reference to general laws, or "abstract principles" as they are called, is poohpoohed, with the tacit implication that in social affairs there is no natural law; and where, as we lately saw, three hundred select spokesmen of the nation cheered frantically when it was decided that they should continue to vow before God that they would maintain certain arrangements prescribed for them by their great, great, great, etc., grandfathers.—Spencer.

ANTIQUITY is infallible, and cannot err. Its antiquity is the indubitable proof of the soundness of an opinion, of a custom, or a ceremony. It is highly important to repulse and discourage all attempts at innovation. The clergy must never relinquish whatever they hav hitherto practiced. —Voltaire.

THE bodily health of a community was held so utterly below the attention of a Christian magistrate that every large city became a hotbed of contagious diseases; small-pox and scrofula became pandemic disorders; the pestilence of the Black Death ravaged Europe from end to end—nay, instead of trying to remove the cause of the evil, the wretched victims were advised to seek relief in prayer and self-torture, and a philosopher uttering a word of protest against such illusions would hav risked to hav his tongue torn out by the roots and his body consigned to the flames of the stake. —Prof. Felix L. Oswald in The Bible of Nature.

EARLY in the last century, Boyer presented inoculation as a preventativ of small-pox, in France; thoughtful physicians in England, led by Lady Montagu and Maitland, followed his example. Theology took fright at once on both sides of the Channel. The French theologians of the Sorbonne solemnly condemned the practice. English theologians were most loudly represented by the Rev. Edward Massy, who, in 1722, preached a sermon in which he declared that Job's distemper was probably confluent small-pox, and that he had been doubtless inoculated by the devil; that diseases are sent by providence for the punishment of sin, and that the proposed attempt to prevent them is "a diabolical operation." This sermon was entitled, "The Dangerous and Sinful Practice of Inoculation." Not less absurd was the sermon of the Rev. Mr. Delafaye, entitled, "Inoculation an Indefensible Practice." Thirty years later the struggle was still going on. But as late as 1753 we hav the rector of Canterbury denouncing inoculation from his pulpit in the primatial city, and many of his brethren following his example. Among the most common weapons hurled by churchmen at the supporters of inoculation, during all this long war, were charges of sorcery and Atheism.—Andrew D. White in The Warfare of Science.

WHOEVER endeavored to account for these things by natural causes, whoever attempted to cure diseases by natural means, was denounced by the church as an Infidel. To explain anything was a crime. It was to the interest of the priest that all phenomena should be accounted for by the will and power of gods and devils.—Ingersoll.

IT was in the reign of pagan emperors, and especially of Hadrian and Alexander Severus, that nearly all the most important measures were taken redressing injustices, elevating oppressed classes, and making the doctrin of the natural equality and fraternity of mankind the basis of legal enactment. Receiving the heritage of those laws, the Christians, no doubt, added something, but a careful examination will show that it was surprisingly little.—Lecky.

I LOOK upon the simple and childish virtues of veracity and honesty as the root of all that is sublime in character.—Emerson.

THE Prohibitionists of Genesee, N. Y., hav adopted the watermelon as their campaign symbol. The party is rather weak in numbers in Genesee, and the object of adopting such a symbol, it is presumed, is to double them up.

"THE trouble with you women," he said, "is that you giv so much thought to trifles." His conscience-smitten wife, looking out of the window ten minutes later, saw him still standing on the sidewalk. He was watching a bootblack extract a cent from a crack.

"YAIS," said Mr. Hoopenheimer, "ve vos qvite a liddle faemily down at dot Hotel Bacharach at Long Branch. Dere vos vun liddle chob-lot of Ghristians ofer at dot taple near de kijjen, bot I kess dey go avay puddy soon. Dey seen ve don't vant to be unkaind by dem, bot ve kain't associade mit 'em, nohow."

A MAN strolled into a fashionable church just before the service began. The sexton followed him up, and tapping him on the shoulder, and pointing to a small cur that had followed him into the sacred edifice, said: "Dogs are not admitted." "That's not my dog," replied the visitor. "But he follows you." "Well, so do you." The sexton growled, and removed the dog with unnecessary violence.

STONE: "Hello, Upson, old man, you're looking fine; you must hav struck luck since I last saw you." Downes: "Yes, old boy; I've struck the boss fake; no more poverty for me; no more small salaries. I've written a book, and my fortune is made." Stone: "I'd like to know what you could write about." Downes: "Hush! don't giv it away; great snap; hav written on, 'How to Liv Comfortably on Ten Dollars a Week.'" Stone: "But you never could." Downes: "Nor anyone else—that's why they all buy the book to find out." Stone: "H'm, yes—I see."

THEY were on their bridal tour, and she said gaily: "Now, Fred, we don't want everybody in the car to know that we are newly married, and hav them all staring at us. Let us act like real old married people. It'll be such jolly fun." "All right," said Fred, calmly. "You just let me hav that end of the seat; it's lots pleasanter than this. I'll take the pillow, too, and I guess I'll go to sleep for three or four hours. You waken me when we come to the dinner station. Spread that shawl over me, and——" "Oh, I don't care who knows that we're just married," she said. "Sit where you are, dear, and hold my hand."

THE NEW FIRST READER.

Lesson 1.—"Let us go upon the street car and take a long ride. Do you see with what swiftness they move?"

"I do. The motion almost takes my breath away."

"You must hang on to your hat or you will lose it. Do you see the lady with pink strings on her bonnet?"

"Yes, I see her. She is very pale and nervous. Is she afraid that the car will run off the track?"

"Not exactly. She is worried about the conductor."

"Is he not a good man?"

"He is a noble fellow, with a wife and ten children to support; but she is afraid of his eyesight. Do you see that coin in her fingers?"

"Yes. It is a silver quarter."

"No, my son; it is a lead quarter—one she has been trying to get rid of for a month. Now he comes along and she hands it out and smiles and sweetly exclaims: 'Tickets, please!'"

"And the conductor?"

"He smiles sweetly but sadly."

"And——"

"And returns it with the remark that she ought to hav worked it off on circus day."

"And is she sorrowful?"

"Oh, no! She is as mad as a wet hen, and she takes the number of the car and will try to hav the conductor bounced for incivility to passengers."

Lesson 2.—"It is night, but if you hav sharp eyes you can see a man in the shadow of the trees across the way."

"Yes, I see him. He seems to be spying on that house near by."

"So he is. Some folks might jump to the conclusion that he was a burglar, but he is not. He is, on the contrary, one of our most estimable citizens, and livs in that very house."

"Why does he act so queerly?"

"They all do when out till this late hour. He is taking time to decide."

"Must he decide something?"

"He must. He must decide whether to walk in openly and boldly tell his wife that he was detained at the office on important business, or sneak in and hope to find her asleep, and then vow next morning that it was only 10 o'clock."

"But wasn't he detained at the office?"

"Oh, yes! but it's an old chestnut with her, you know."

"Perhaps she is asleep."

"Perhaps she isn't. That's her at the upper window, and she is watching him. Poor man! How sad his lot! But such is life in a great city."

ON THE ANXIOUS SEAT.

Notes and Clippings.

A MAN writes to the Sun that a Jew is not eligible to the presidency, as "ours is a Christian government, founded on Christian principles." The Sun replies that the man is mistaken.

SENATOR BLAIR has given up all hope for the success of his Educational bill. His peculiar legislativ genius will not long droop under the weight of disaster, however. Blair is too pious to permit the treasury surplus to bite its thumb at him forever.

PASTOR THUMMEL, an evangelical preacher in Solingen, created a sensation by accusing the archbishop of Cologne and the canons of Aix-la-Chapell of blasphemy and the breach of the third Commandment. The burgomaster immediately rose and declared the meeting at an end. It broke up after much excitement, and the pastor will prosecute the burgomaster for brawling in church.

THE fifth article of the constitution of Brazil reads as follows: "The Roman Catholic shall continue to be the religion of the state; all others shall, however, be tolerated, with their special worship, in private houses designated for this purpose, without the exterior form of a temple." Great liberty has been allowed in interpreting this article, only steeples and bells being forbidden to very churchly structures; and even one or two inconspicuous towers hav been built. A recent attempt to compel the removal of these ornaments led to the introduction of a bill last October to revoke the fifth article and allow full liberty. No action would hav been taken, however, but for a recent outbreak; and, after a full discussion, the bill has now passed the legislativ assembly. The bill, the Independent says, provides for the fullest religious liberty.

DR. CAMPBELL, who has been delivering lectures on his different "theories" at Versailles, Ind., for several days, claims to hav located the garden of Eden in the United States. He says that the city of St. Louis is erected on the site of the garden, and that the Mississippi is none other than the Euphrates river. He calls on the Bible to prove all his statements, and says that within two months he will hav all the world agog on the subject.

THE Congregationalist wails: "Now and then Christians are both pained and alarmed by rumors from the Hawaiian islands that idolatry is resuming its sway among the nativs, and that Christianity is being rapidly crushed out. That the alarm in Hawaii is well founded is proved by the action of the American Board, a year ago, in sending out reinforcements to that field; and it is evident from statements in the last Honolulu Friend that still further measures may be necessary to check the evil. Since 1880 there has been a systematic effort to reinstate old heathen practices, some of them unspeakably revolting in character, and the corrupt legislature of 1886 actually organized a board of heathen sorcery, though under the innocent title of a board of health. The natural result is a sad moral deterioration." The Congregationalist should hav given us a bill of particulars, so we could know just what the heathen are doing, and determin whether or not it is necessary to go down and kill them in order to make them moral Christians.

THE memorial of San Francisco citizens calling for the impeachment of two federal judges of the Pacific coast was submitted to Congress on Monday. The petitioners charge that these judges hav virtually nullified the Chinese Restriction act by taking its enforcement out of the customs collector's hands and usurping his power. Mercenary motivs are alleged, a relativ of one of the judges being directly interested in fees received in the numerous habeas corpus cases brought in behalf of the incoming Chinamen. The memorial is a very savage arraignment.

COL. JACK CUNNINGHAM, one of the leaders in politics in Charleston, S. C., has awakened that city by his charges against the Democrats and Catholics. He says that the Democratic party hires Irish citizens to do its dirty work, and adds that the pope claims the right to rule all mankind in all the various relations of life. "It is known," he says, "that the free schools hav been antagonized and denounced by the Romanist sectarians in our midst as 'schools of hell;' that the simple imparting of knowledge in the schools and colleges of our country is a crime against the Roman papacy, although it would be a crime against the God of the universe not to reason and not to learn." He also charges that the pope has, through his cardinal at Baltimore, issued the dictum of the Roman Catholic church corporation against the system of American free education, and its mandate to its missions is that Roman Catholic bishops shall be excommunicated unless they establish Romish parochial schools everywhere they can, and they hav the hardihood to demand state aid to help them cram Romanism down us. The real and ultimate object is to control American education and subordinate it to the papacy, and thus secure ecclesiastical despotism."

THE Cleveland Leader says editorially: "According to Christian doctrin, Catholic as well as Protestant, it is a sin for a man to marry his brother's or sister's daughter. Under the laws of this and other states, and of some of the nations of Europe, it is a high crime punishable by long imprisonment. The duke of Aosta fell in love with his niece and desired to marry her. He sent $20,000 to the pope for a dispensation or indulgence to commit this crime against the laws of the church and of most civilized governments, and the pope has just sent him the desired permission in writing. The Catholics of Boston, who control the public schools of that city, hav just thrown out Swinton's History as a text-book because it says the popes sold indulgences to commit sin. The facts related above show that the pope does sell indulgences to commit sin, and there is no doubt that those before him did likewise. In view of this latest proof of such sale, we fail to see on what grounds the Catholics of Boston or any other city can reasonably complain of the historical statement in Swinton's text-book. The example of the duke of Aosta and the Princess Letitia Bonaparte, his niece, goes to show that $20,000, in hard cash, will obtain papal sanction for an incestuous intercourse that would send a poor man to the penitentiary and debar him forever from access to decent society. There are a good many queer things in this world, and this is one of the queerest."

From the World.

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, the great Agnostic, has always been an ardent defender of the sanctity of the home and of the marriage relation. Apropos of the horrible account of a man's tearing out the eyes of his wife at Far Rockaway last week, Colonel Ingersoll was asked what recourse a woman had under such circumstances. Said he:

I read the account, and I don't remember of ever having read anything more perfectly horrible and cruel. It is impossible for me to imagin such a monster, or to account for such an inhuman human being. How a man could deprive a human being of sight, except where some religious question is involved, is beyond my comprehension. We know that for many centuries frightful punishments were inflicted, and inflicted by the pious, by the theologians, by the spiritual-minded, and by those who "loved their neighbors as themselvs." We read the accounts of how the lids of men's eyes were cut off and then the poor victims tied where the sun would shine upon their lidless orbs. Of others who were buried alive. Of others staked out on the sands of the sea to be drowned by the rising tide. Of others put in sacks filled with snakes. Yet these things appeared far away, and we flattered ourselvs that, to a great degree, the world had outgrown these atrocities; and now, here, near the close of the nineteenth century, we find a man—a husband—cruel enough to put out the eyes of the woman he swore to love, protect, and cherish. This man has probably been taught that there is forgivness for every crime, and now imagins that when he repents there will be more joy in heaven over him than over ninety and nine good and loving husbands who hav treated their wives in the best possible manner, and who, instead of tearing out their eyes, hav filled their lives with content and covered their faces with kisses.

You told me last week, in a general way, what society should do with the husband in such a case as that. I would like to ask you, to-day, what you think society ought to do with the wife in such a case, or what ought the wife to be permitted to do for herself?

When we take into consideration the crime of the man who blinded his wife, it is impossible not to think of the right of divorce. Many people insist that marriage is an indissoluble tie; that nothing can break it, and that nothing can release either party from the bond. Now, take this case at Far Rockaway. One year ago the husband tore out one of his wife's eyes. Had she then good cause for divorce? Is it possible that an infinitly wise and good God would insist on the poor, helpless woman remaining with the wild beast, her husband? Can anyone imagin that such a course would add to the joy of paradise, or even tend to keep one harp in tune? Can the good of society require the woman to remain? She did remain, and the result is that the other eye has been torn from its socket by the hands of the husband. Is she entitled to a divorce now? And if she is granted one, is virtue in danger, and shall we lose the high ideal of home life? Can anything be more infamous than to endeavor to make a woman, under such circumstances, remain with such a man? It may be said that she should leave him—that they should liv separate and apart—that is to say, that this woman should be deprived of a home; that she should not be entitled to the love of man; that she should remain for the rest of her days worse than a widow. That is to say, a wife hiding, keeping out of the way, secreting herself from the hyena to whom she was married. Nothing, in my judgment, can exceed the heartlessness of a law or of a creed that would compel this woman to remain the wife of this monster. And it is not only cruel, but it is immoral, low, vulgar.

The ground has been taken that woman would lose her dignity if marriage were dissoluble. Is it necessary to lose your freedom in order to retain your character, in order to be womanly or manly? Must a woman, in order to retain her womanhood, become a slave, a serf, with a wild beast for a master, or with society for a master, or with a phantom for a master? Has not the married woman the right of self-defense? Is it not the duty of society to protect her from her husband? If she owes no duty to her husband; if it is impossible for her to feel toward him any thrill of affection, what is there of marriage left? What part of the contract remains in force? She is not to liv with him, because she abhors him. She is not to remain in the same house with him, for fear he may kill her. What, then, are their relations? Do they sustain any relation except that of hunter and hunted—that is, of tyrant and victim? And is it desirable that this relation should be rendered sacred by a church? Is it desirable to hav families raised under such circumstances? Are we really in need of the children born of such parents? If the woman is not in fault, does society insist that her life should be wrecked? Can the virtue of others be preserved only by the destruction of her happiness, and by what might be called her perpetual imprisonment? I hope the clergy who believe in the sacredness of marriage—in the indissolubility of the marriage tie—will giv their opinions on this case. I believe that marriage is the most important contract that human beings can make. I always believe that a man will keep his contract; that a woman, in the highest sense, will keep hers. But suppose the man does not? Is the woman still bound?

Is there no mutuality? What is a contract? It is where one party promises to do something in consideration that the other party will do something. That is to say, there is a consideration on both sides, moving from one to the other. A contract without consideration is null and void; and a contract duly entered into, where the consideration of one party is withheld, is voidable, and can be avoided by the party who has kept, or who is willing to keep, the contract. A marriage without love is bad enough. But what can we say of a marriage where the parties hate each other? Is there any morality in this—any virtue? Will any decent person say that a woman, true, good, and loving, should be compelled to liv with a man she detests, compelled to be the mother of his children? Is there a woman in the world who would not shrink from this herself? And is there a woman so heartless and so immoral that she would force another to bear what she would shudderingly avoid? Let us bring these questions home. In other words, let us hav some sense, some feeling, some heart, and just a little brain. Marriages are made by men and women. They are not made by the state and they are not made by the gods. By this time people should learn that usefulness to human happiness is the foundation of virtue—the foundation of morality. Nothing is moral that does not tend to the well-being of sentient things. Nothing is virtuous the result of which is not a human good. The world has always been living for phantoms, for ghosts, for monsters begotten by ignorance and fear. The world should learn to liv for itself. Man should, by this time, be convinced that all the reasons for doing right, and all the reasons for doing wrong, are right here in this world—all within the horizon of this life. And besides, we should hav imagination to put ourselvs in the place of another. Let a man suppose himself a helpless wife, beaten by a brute who believes in the indissolubility of marriage. Would he want a divorce?

I suppose that very few people hav any adequate idea of the sufferings of women and children; of the number of wives who tremble when they hear the footsteps of a returning husband; of the number of children who hide when they hear the voice of a father. Very few people know the number of blows that fall on the flesh of the helpless every day. Few know the nights of terror passed by mothers holding young children at their breasts. Compared with this, the hardships of poverty, borne by those who love each other, are nothing. Men and women truly married bear the sufferings of poverty. They console each other; their affection givs to the heart of each perpetual sunshine. But think of the others! I hav said a thousand times that the home is the unit of good government. When we hav kind fathers and loving mothers, then we will hav civilized nations, and not until then. Civilization commences at the hearthstone. When intelligence rocks the cradle—when the house is filled with philosophy and kindness—you will see a world at peace. Justice will sit in the courts, wisdom in the legislativ halls, and over all, like the dome of heaven, will be the spirit of liberty!

What is your idea with regard to divorce?

My idea is this: As I said before, marriage is the most sacred contract—the most important contract—that human beings can make. As a rule, the woman dowers the husband with her youth—with all she has. From this contract the husband should never be released, unless the wife has broken a condition; that is to say, has failed to perform the contract of marriage. On the other hand, the woman should be allowed a divorce for the asking. This should be granted in public, precisely as the marriage should be in public. Every marriage should be known. There should be witnesses, to the end that the character of the contract entered into should be understood; and as all marriage records should be kept, so the divorce should be open, public, and known. The property should be divided by a court of equity, under certain regulations of law. If there are children, they should be provided for through the property and the parents. People should understand that men and women are not virtuous by law. They should comprehend the fact that law does not create virtue—that law is not the foundation, the fountain, of love. They should understand that love is in the human heart, and that real love is virtuous. People who love each other will be true to each other. The death of love is the commencement of vice. Besides this, there is a public opinion that has great weight. When that public opinion is right, it does a vast amount of good, and when wrong, a great amount of harm. People marry, or should marry, because it increases the happiness of each and all. But where the marriage turns out to hav been a mistake, and where the result is misery, and not happiness, the quicker they are divorced the better, not only for themselvs, but for the community at large. These arguments are generally answered by some donkey braying about free love, and by "free love" he means a condition of society in which there is no love. The persons who make this cry are, in all probability, incapable of the sentiment, of the feeling, known as love. They judge others by themselvs, and they imagin that without law there would be no restraint.

What do they say of natural modesty? Do they forget that people hav a choice? Do they not understand something of the human heart, and that true love has always been as pure as the morning star? Do they believe that by forcing people to remain together who despise each other they are adding to the purity of the marriage relation? Do they not know that all marriage is an outward act, testifying to that which has happened in the heart? Still, I always believe that words are wasted on such people. It is useless to talk to anybody about music who is unable to distinguish one tune from another. It is useless to argue with a man who regards his wife as his property, and it is hardly worth while to suggest anything to a gentleman who imagins that society is so constructed that it really requires, for the protection of itself, that the lives of good and noble women should be wrecked. I am a believer in the virtue of women, in the honesty of men. The average woman is virtuous; the average man is honest, and the history of the world shows it. If it were not so, society would be impossible. I don't mean by this that most men are perfect, but what I mean is this: That there is far more good than evil in the average human being, and that the natural tendency of most people is toward the good and toward the right. And I most passionately deny that the good of society demands that any good person should suffer. I do not regard government as a Juggernaut, the wheels of which must, of necessity, roll over and crush the virtuous, the self-denying, and the good. My doctrin is the exact opposit of what is known as Free Love. I believe in the marriage of true minds and of true hearts. But I believe that thousands of people are married who do not love each other. That is the misfortune of our century. Other things are taken into consideration—position, wealth, title, and the thousand things that hav nothing to do with real affection. Where men and women truly love each other, that love, in my judgment, lasts as long as life. The greatest line that I know of in the poetry of the world is in the 116th Sonnet of Shakspere:

Love is not love which alters when it alteration finds.

Why do you make such a distinction between the rights of men and the rights of women?

The woman has, as her capital, her youth, her beauty. We will say that she is married at twenty or twenty-five. In a few years she has lost her beauty. During these years the man, so far as capacity to make money is concerned—to do something—has grown better and better. That is to say, his chances hav improved; hers hav diminished. She has dowered him with the spring of her life, and as her life advances her chances decrease. Consequently, I would giv her the advantage, and I would not compel her to remain with him against her will. It seems to me far worse to be a wife upon compulsion than to be a husband upon compulsion. Besides this, I hav a feeling of infinit tenderness toward mothers. The woman who bears children, certainly she should not be compelled to liv with a man whom she despises. The suffering is enough when the father of the child is to her the one man of all this world. Many people who hav a mechanical apparatus in their breasts that assists in the circulation of what they call blood, regard these views as sentimental. But when we take sentiment out of the world nothing is left worth living for, and when you get sentiment out of the heart it is nothing more nor less than a pump, an old piece of rubber that has acquired the habit of contracting and dilating. But I hav this consolation: The people who don't agree with me are those who don't understand me.

Some Comments on Hell.

And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal (Matt. xxv, 46).

Hell is the abode of the damned! The road to hell is strewn with roses. All the pleasures of life, all the joys of this world, all the desires of the flesh, are just so many snares of the devil to drag us down to perdition. This is according to Paul. What is hell? It is a lake of fire and brimstone, a bottomless pit (Rev. xx, 3). It is the place where unbelievers will be punished forever. The old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, is the king of hell. We are brought into this world without our own volition—our brains are not of our own making. No two of us are alike in mind or body. One will believe on a class of evidence another will wholly reject, and both be equally honest, and as far as God and the devil are concerned no harm is done, unless the belief happens to be concerning the son of God; then all is different. If it is averse to Bible teachings, God frowns; the devil smiles. God passes the soul of that person over to the adversary of souls, and he makes a special effort to make it as uncomfortable as infinit power and satanic malignity can contrive, and the more pain, sorrow, and suffering he can inflict, the happier he is; and this most infernal, stupendous tragedy goes on and on. Systems change; almost infinit periods of time elapse; suns fade; eons of ages go by; other suns and systems spring into existence and run their cycles of change—the human soul remains through all, like the vitals of Prometheus, ever being devoured, but never diminishing—ever writhing; everything lost except the acute capacity to suffer. Not a ray, not a shadow of hope—all gloom; all remorse; all woe—an endless pilgrimage of unrest, of wretchedness; the heart desolate and sick—despair, utter hopelessness, wreck, ruin, grief, misfortune, regret, unavailing groans—all that language can express, all that the mind can conceive, of hellish suffering through the long-drawn ages and never-ending time. Continued and continued suffering. This is hell! How do you, miserable hypocrits, like the picture?

You are all bound to go there—you who do not love the Lord—who make a pretense, and groan out your long, whining, sanctimonious prayers, deceiving yourselvs, thinking your precious taffy will please the Lord. Your lot, gaged by your own doctrin, will be worse than that of the Infidel.

Who will go to hell? All Infidels, idolators, liars, thieves, and murderers who do not repent before death—all adulterers, except Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, Solomon, together with a lovely lot of prophets, priests, and kings who stood in with the holy God, on the ground floor, as it were—all who are positivly wicked, and negativly all who do not crawl into heaven. This includes all Brahmans; all followers of Confucius and Buddha; all the untamed tribes of Africa; all Mohammedans; all the Indians of all the isles and continents; all the inhabitants of Arctic climes where it is too cold for missionaries to bask in "innocuous desuetude"—in fact, all and singular of the sons of men who hav never heard some sky-pilot tell the glorious tidings that Jesus has brought life and light to a fallen world.

There is no other name under heaven whereby poor man can be saved. In fact, let us ask, Is man lost? (This reminds us of a lone Indian, wandering in search of his tent. He was confused—turned round. Some one asked him: "Ain't you lost?" "No; wigwam lost. Me here!") Four-fifths or more of all the men in the Christian world, a majority of the women, most of the boys and girls who hav arrived at maturity and accountability—all these will be inhabitants of hell. In the list will be nearly all the men and women of brains—nearly all the great philosophers, poets, philanthropists, geologists, astronomers, and naturalists. Darwin is there. Humboldt, Spencer, Volney, Goethe, Hume, Jefferson, Franklin, Emerson, Longfellow, et al, will be writhing in agony, suffering the torment of the damned; while Bonaparte, serene and calm, with all the infamous murderers of Europe who drenched the world in gore to bear the cross—all the movers in the frenzied wars who bore the "sword of the Lord and Gideon"—the rank and file of the armies of extermination and Canaanitish conquest—all the Inquisitors who racked their brains to invent instruments of torture to rack the bodies of heretics—armies of religious fanatics and ignorant bigots; narrow saints—all these will stand on the battlements of heaven, watching with "reverential calm" the writhings of the damned.

God does not want intelligent men and women in heaven, for "he has concealed the things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them to babes"—and he might hav said, and fools. I take this occasion to thank him for not sending his fools to hell. I do not want their company. The devil reaps the harvest of the world; he husbands the wealth of brains and intelligence, leaving God the empty skulls. Hell is crowded with philosophers, heaven with stupidity; hell with progress, heaven with faith; hell with humanity, heaven with sycophancy; hell with genius, heaven with the silly; hell with the noble and brave, heaven with cringing cowards. Hell is peopled with Shaksperes, Byrons, and Shelleys; heaven with Calvins. Constantine, the pious murderer of wife and son; Moses, who slew the poor Egyptian; Jacob, the bigamist and adulterer; Samson, the liar and adulterer, will bask in heaven. (Wonder if David won't say to Uriah: "Here's your wife. Take her. I'm done with her!" Uriah will love him, sure.) Solomon, the hero of a thousand women, will be there in heaven's rays; while the Rev. Ingram Corbin, M.A., D.D. (Doctor of Sick Divinity), and author of "Notes and [so-called] Reflections," editor of "The Domestic Bible"—all these will revel and laugh and gloat over the unfortunate in hell, themselvs serene on that cloudless shore. Bruno, Pope, Byron, Shelley, Hood, Paine, Galileo—yes, hosts on hosts who hav added untold wealth of knowledge to the world—hav been rewarded for their poetry, patriotism, and philosophy by back seats in hell. Tyndall, Huxley, Eli Perkins, Halstead, Joe Medill, Mark Twain, E. A. Stevens, Putnam, Ingersoll, John Peck, John Bushel, glorious old Aunt Elmina, young, bright, and worthy Helen Gardener, Voltairine de Cleyre—and, yes! Brothers Seaver, E. Macdonald, Somerby, Si Slokum, Denslow, Palmer, with hosts of others, many of them hoary with the age of usefulness—will wake up in hell, and eternally lament that they could not see the great love of God and believe that three times one are one.

What shall we do with hell? We will slay its king with the club of reason, of philosophy, of science, of humanity, of truth and courage. We will extinguish the fires with the tears of charity and hope and love. There is no space in the universe for this monstrous prison. We want the space for stars and worlds and suns. As we educate, hell recedes. Already the fires are burning low. The flames no longer overtop the temple of reason. Justice has declared that hell is no longer wanted. The great benevolent heart and brain of the closing century says hell must go! The Universalist is drowning the fires with the tears of universal brotherhood; the advanced theologian is smothering the fires with the coming religious love, and bringing a better religion of the future to the front. For a while yet the priest will feed the flames with oily sinners, but the people are rising in arms against the blasphemy of a universal power some call God. Hell must go!

New Windsor, Ill. REV. GEO. ENDERTON.

Shame, Where Is Thy Blush?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER; Sir: I am a Hebrew, consequently could not be a Christian, but neither am I an Infidel. Therefore, if anybody will interpret my writing into Infidelity, he will be mistaken. The intention of my present writing is neither to uphold nor to degrade any creed or dogma. My sole object is to endeavor to rescue truth from its sworn enemy falsehood. The abstracted sermon of Rev. Chas. B. Smyth in the Herald of August 6th I will take as a text for my present sermon. Rev. Mr. Smyth, on a midsummer Sunday, became warmed up on account of the few remarks made by Colonel Ingersoll over the body of the late Courtlandt Palmer. What I can't comprehend is how Christianity, in its ripe old age of nineteen centuries, with hundreds of millions of adherents, consisting of many crowned heads, royalty, nobility, military, press, infallible and fallible priestcraft, and a host of other powers too numerous to mention, should display timidity whenever teased by baby-like Infidelity.

At the time when civilization was in its infancy, Christianity drained many rivers of human blood to extinguish the feeble spark of Infidelity. Ever since civilization matured and became of age, substituting the mighty pen for the sword, Christianity was never idle in its endeavor to obliterate everything and everybody that led to Antichristianity, but with the most unsatisfactory results. Now it begins to realize that all its literature served as fuel to blazing Infidelity. The conversion of Christian ministers to Freethought by far exceeds that of Infidels to Christianity. The spasmodic revivals, the overcoming of their ministers by the presence of God, all evaporate like soap-bubbles. The only thing permanent is the enormous salary of the boy and men preachers. The press, which is more or less Christian, serves refreshing burlesques from the revival men.

Should my question remain unanswered, I will endeavor to find a solution myself. To present all the reasons, I fear, will be too monotonous. I will, therefore, pick out one of the many reasons. In my estimation, Christianity is at fault for wasting all its energies to cement the prophecies of both the Old and the New Testaments. It never stopped to reflect whether the prophecies of the New Testament were ever fulfilled. Has anybody ever feasted his eyes upon a New Testament Christian? While numerous instruments of torture are displayed in royal museums as relics of Christian barbarism, never was any Christian, dead or alive, exhibited who turned his left cheek after having been smitten on the right. Every sect of Christianity boasts its faith to excel that of its opponent; but, strange, never was a Christian produced who removed a mountain, resurrected the dead, or healed the sick. All these things, according to the gospel, could be produced by faith the size of a mustard-seed grain. Hav those Christians who found Spiritualism in the New Testament ever produced a paragraph set up and printed in the spiritual world? To the contrary, we see paragraphs, composed by the printers' devil on earth, telling how some faith curists are accused of manslaughter. The same devil furnishes us with the startling news that the kings and queens of Spiritualism, who made specialties of valuable oil paintings, are now languishing behind prison bars and make shrouds for the pauper dead.

In order to demonstrate my assertions by living facts, look at Judaism, which, though tottering from old age of thirty-two centuries, with a handful of followers, without kings, popes, or power of any kind, persecuted from the cradle to the grave, yet stood the test of fire, water, blood, and iron. And why? Because it wants to prove nothing and stands independent of its scriptures. Though many deny the sacredness of its book, their belief, however, in a creativ power is unshaken. The reason for this is their belief in a God who, though enveloped in mystery and surrounded by miracles, is yet unlimited. The Jew believes because God is incomprehensible and unlimited. Nay, no sooner does he attempt to comprehend or limit his God to nature, science, and evolution, than he ceases to be a believer. The true believer adds nature, science, and evolution to his God.

But why enter into a philosophical discussion when plain, living facts are in abundance? Reverend Smyth is smiting hard Christian blows upon both cheeks of Infidelity. I am far from protecting it. In fact, a few blows will do it no harm. But why not repeat the words of the New Testament, Matt. vii, 3: "And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?" Rev. Mr. Smyth upbraids Infidelity; why not upbraid Christian ministers who, in the name of Christianity, not only tell falsehoods but write and print them? There is a missionary to the Jews, who, though he livs on faith, yet for a dessert swallows thousands of Uncle Sam's silver and paper dollars; whose depravity of character and false motivs in general, and ignorant state in particular, I hav substantiated and repeatedly proved. But with what result?

An eminent Christian divine, a trustee of the conversion establishment, offered his services as bearer of my letter to the president. After complying with all the necessary requisitions, I received a letter from that divine stating that he had forwarded my epistle to the president, etc. Finally, when I informed him that the president never received the letter in question, the divine, after deluging me with abuse à la Christianity, for penetrating beyond the mask of hypocrisy, was forced to confess that he acted contrary to his writing, and instead of sending it to the president delivered the letter to the arch-falsifying missionary against whom my charges were made.

Again, an influential Christian editor invited me to prove my charges. After my granting his request, he coincided with me privately, but ignored me publicly. Another eminent reverend doctor and editor of Rev. Mr. Smyth's denomination told me repeatedly that while he believed the missionary to the Jews to be a fraud, he excused himself from coming out publicly for fear of hurting the cause. What would Rev. Mr. Smyth say if such a state of things were the ruling power in the camp of Infidelity? In his fiery sermon he exclaims: "O ruinous Infidelity! Away! Away! Hide thy face in ignominy!" If, as says the American adage, "what is sauce for the goose is also sauce for the gander," why not return the compliment and exclaim: "O ruinous falsehood! Away! Away! Hide thy face in ignominy?" An ignorant tramp is receiving thousands of dollars knowingly falsifying himself under every hypocritical mask imaginable, such as fringes, phylacteries, scrolls, in fact, anything to make money in the name of—not Infidelity, but Christianity.

My Christian friends, the truth, like a gem, retains its beauty and value everywhere. The truth, told by king or peasant, in the palace or in the hut, is the same truth. It is falsehood that fluctuates in value and changes its color, depending upon where it is told and whom by. The falsehood told by the king in the palace shines brighter than that told by the peasant in his hut. It is falsehood when told that out of a Jewish population in Kishineff of twenty-five thousand, fifty thousand Jews embraced Christianity; it required no other authority than the Christian at Work to tell it. It is falsehood that required the columns of the Herald for weeks to daub with the title "ex-rabbi" Missionary Slamowitz, who threatened, through the Herald, to convert the Jews of New York quicker than he could say Jack Robinson. Where is he now? It was falsehood that required the Sun to do the same thing for Ex-Rabbi Rosevalley. Where is he now? In an Ohio penitentiary, not for preaching the gospel, but for interleaving his New Testament with counterfeit greenbacks. And it is falsehood that launched the boss ignoramus, Freshman, into a "son of a rabbi." And where is he? Laughing in his sleeve when his back is turned against his dupes. And they in return do likewise. But when facing each other they all resume serious, hypocritical faces, protecting each other against being exposed before poor, absurd truth.

I doubt very much whether Rev. Mr. Smyth will use my assertions as text for his next sermon. Should he do so, it will certainly not be abstracted by the Herald. That paper will utilize the space for "copyrighting" from head to foot some renowned Christian pugilist.

I would hav continued my arguments were it not for the sheolic weather on earth. I will, therefore, wind up with Freshman's gospel, and apply the following verse to Rev. Mr. Smyth: "Judge not, that ye be not judged." A. BENJAMIN.

Cleveland and Pittsburgh.

After an all-night's ride we are landed in the expansiv and beautiful city of Cleveland, celebrated for its broad thoroughfares, its marvelous aqueducts, its couple of cannon captured by Commodore Perry, its "magnificent distances" and considerably contracted theology, which, since its Secular Union has fallen into "desuetude," has held undisputed sway. My presence was for the purpose of breathing the breath of life into this once activ band of Liberals.

My first call was on S. F. de Jones, for years president of the Pittsburgh society, and who, with Staley and Hoover, formed the triumvirate of that splendid host. De Jones has not lost his old-time enthusiasm, but will be deterred from similar effort in the future only by lack of opportunity.

Tom F. Lucas made a splendid record as secretary of the Cleveland society, and arrangements were made for my visiting the old members, the result being that all seen expressed a desire to revive the work, and about September 15th the Union of Cleveland will rehoist the Secular flag, and it is expected that they will be strongly represented at the coming Congress. It was quite a disappointment not to meet Mr. Lucas's amiable and earnest Liberal wife.

The intellectual needs of the Liberal movement in the city of Cleveland are Judge Blanden and Ex-Sheriff John M. Wilcox. The distinguished judge recently thwarted the schemes of the Catholics to secure free water for their institutions. He has often lectured for the society and is willing to aid them again. Mr. Wilcox is now managing editor of the Press, whose circulation, for years ahead of all other dailies, has doubled under his control.

A very pleasant evening was passed with Mr. and Mrs. Pearson, both persons of unusual culture and natural refinement. Mrs. Pearson was formerly a teacher, coming from a family already prominent in literature. She has prepared several excellent papers for the society herself.

Sunday evening I called at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gillsen, a venerable couple of veterans who hav drawn their inspiration from the Investigator for over forty years, and who are seventy-six and seventy-nine respectivly. Mr. Gillsen has more enthusiasm than many young Liberals now, although he still labors every day. Englishmen seldom grow old.

President Copeland said that he was glad to hear the organization was to be revived, and Brother Thomas Lees also rejoiced on the same score. During the canvass of the situation, I discovered quite a number of additional Liberals who purpose joining the society when the reorganization is effected.

One day, while "killing time" for an appointment, I sauntered into the Public Library, looked up the list of books, and can say, without fear of contradiction, that Cleveland has the trashiest public library of any city of importance in the world. It was so marvelously apparent that I could not refrain from asking the attendant for the names of the members, when behold, among the list I recognized the name of an old friend whom I knew was in no way afflicted with religious rabies. I determined to call upon him, and, after spending several hours in the search, found him at his elegant suburban home. He had not been long on the board, but had revolutionized the German department, and the class of works he had introduced made a commendable increase of patronage. He pledged me that if I would furnish him a list of good standard works, Liberal literature, such as were in other libraries, he would secure their adoption. That will be done. For nine years the Cleveland library board hav had a secretary who considers it his bounden duty to look after Jesus's interests, apparently afraid he can't take care of himself, and he has thrust into this library forty-five per cent of exclusivly religious literature. It is the duty of individual Secularists as well as societies to see that public institutions are not maintained merely for Christ's sake. My friend will also join the Secular Union, and can enlist the German Freethinkers in our movement better than any other person, for besides being president of the local Turner society, he is also president of the whole district, including Ohio, Pennsylvania, and part of Michigan. He will be a valuable acquisition.

With assurances of activ work in the future, I was ready to depart, but a letter from Helen Gardener notifying me that Elizabeth Cady Stanton was probably then in Cleveland, and as we were negotiating with her to attend the next Congress to lecture, I determined to delay a couple of days. But as the head of the woman's movement in America came not, I bade our good friend De Jones good-bye, and was soon whirling over the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie railroad through one of the most delightfully beautiful and wonderfully varied panoramic scenes the American continent affords. As far as Youngstown we pass through a rich agricultural district. The rolling lands and lovely dells, woods, and copse, the "verdure-clad" mountain ranges in the distance, speak volumes of Mother Nature's loveliness. In Pennsylvania we skirt round the base of lofty mountains where rugged rocks seem ready to crush the innocent traveler; then we plunge across streams until we move slowly over the broad Ohio, suspended about one hundred feet in air on a slim-looking bridge. Then more skirting of rivers; higher appear the mountains, though now their sides are dotted with homes, and the merry laugh of children rolls into the car as they pluck the ripe pears which hang so temptingly near our window. Everybody here has a home on the hillside. A bright little miss of thirteen takes a part of my seat and me into her confidence, as she relates all about her homesickness in the country and desire to return to Pittsburgh, and catechises my considerably. But here we are, and I regretfully bade the pretty prattler good-bye.

Crossing the Monongahela, I report at once to Staley's bookstore, the headquarters for all heretics. He was not in, but, much to his surprise, I stopped him on the street and received a hearty welcome from the only Roman of us all. Next morning Harry Hoover's familiar face lights up as we enter. From what I learned from our stalwart workers here, they are making most elaborate preparations, and we soon settled the necessary preliminaries of the coming twelfth and most important Congress the Union has ever held Thankful that no drumming up of discouraged members was required here, as our standard has floated at full mast ever since this loyal host was formed within its limits and gallantly led by De Jones, Roman Staley, Harry Hoover, and F. A. Pierce, the editor of that bright little paper Truth. Brother Timby, Mr. and Mrs. Abel, Mr. and Mrs. Barker, Brothers Schade, Aggas, Fischer, and Bambach are all sterling, good Secular soldiers, who stand in the front rank, and each anxious for the success of the coming Congress.

Before I forget it, let me mention to your readers that excursion rates hav been granted by the Central Traffic Association to all parties attending the Congress. That is, for a continuous passage and return each person must procure a certificate from the ticket agent where he purchases his ticket, paying full fare to Pittsburgh, but when I sign their certificate here they will get a one-third fare for their return trip. Of that I shall speak hereafter.

With myself, most people who hav not seen Pittsburgh since the natural gas has been introduced remember only a dingy, sooty town where, even on a sunny day, the gas would be lit in the stores. All that has been changed, and Pittsburgh is now one of the cleanest cities on this continent, so far as soot is concerned.

Roman Staley took me to the public park in Alleghany Tuesday night, to listen to the Great Western Band, under the leadership of Professor Wise, where we spent a most delightful evening. The selections, which they executed in faultless style, were from the most difficult operatic arias, and several musical novelties were introduced, much to the delight of about twenty thousand listeners. This entertainment was furnished by one of the leading dry-goods houses. The band is a credit to Pittsburgh, or any other city.

Like Rome, Pittsburgh sits upon seven hills. They are mountains in hight, and rugged in appearance; but like well-kept terraces, hundreds of paved streets and avenues scale their slopes. Houses are preferred on these summits, and the dizzier the altitude the happier are the people. For this reason it has become a city of hill-climbers, and I guess that accounts for the multitude of pretty girls, as the exercise necessary to the climbing of these hills naturally develops and rounds their forms, and givs a healthy glow to their cheeks. As the great iron-mills people this city with thousands of Vulcans, it is strikingly appropriate that they should hav their Venuses, for Venus married Vulcan, you'll remember. Some one informed me that ice-creepers were necessary even in summer for those who liv in the more precipitous pathways. Rough-shod horses must be driven by their fashionable drivers just as carefully up these winding roadways as though a sheet of ice were under them; meanwhile the horses are white with sweat. A spool of thread dropped from the lap of a busy housewife sitting on the porch of her hillside home will madly rush to the muddy gutters five hundred feet below.

Your secretary, like a certain historical character, was taken by Harry Hoover up a high mountain and offered the whole job lot for a small consideration, but with that moral fortitude for which Chicagoans are famous, he, like Cæsar, thrice refused—he could not cart it off. Baggage limited to one hundred and fifty pounds. We are on Mount Washington, which rises from the water's edge on the south shore of the Monongahela to an altitude of at least four hundred feet. On a lovely plateau extending back from its brow liv thousands of people. An inclined-plane railway carries you up an almost perpendicular mountain side. You are shot up in a minute, while to attempt to walk it would consume at least an hour—if you ever reached the top. A freight elevator carries teams, and the horses seem quite unmindful that they are being shot up in air. It beats all the aërial navigation I hav heard of. There are eight inclined-plane railways in the twin cities of Allegheny and Pittsburgh. Up to this time no passenger car has jumped the track, but the freight elevator had a smash-up. As may be imagined, the view obtained from this lofty eminence is a grand one, presenting a panoramic stretch of nearly thirty-five miles, including the entire twin cities, the graceful curves of the Alleghany, Monongahela, and the Ohio—for at the foot of this mountain is the source of the Ohio; here is the meeting of the waters. It was Partington who, looking from this awe-inspiring altitude down into the flaming chimneys and blazing furnaces which in the night mark a fiery procession miles in length, said it "looked like hell with the lid off." From Du Quesne Hights is commanded the best bird's-eye view of the sister cities, taking in both the closely built-up sections, the suburban wards, and charming bits of sylvan scenery. Serpentine paths, narrow and perilous, seem indeed to descend to the lower regions.

Penn avenue, one of Pittsburgh's most prominent thoroughfares, is nearly two hundred and fifty feet higher at a certain point than it is just half a mile distant. Only thin people, a Pittsburgher informs me, liv on that portion of the avenue, for fat women can't stand the climb, and the car-horses die too soon pulling them up. Some of the streets are even steeper than Penn avenue, and to drive up them givs a person a going "up in a balloon" sort of a sensation.
